Finally, the all-party group has an excellent track record of success on issues raised on behalf of the Sikh community. They have included, for example, the reintroduction of visa appeals, the establishment of visa facilities in the Punjab—there are some difficulties, but the matter has been agreed in principle and will come about—opposition to appeal charges and the development of the Guru Nanak Sikh school as the first state-funded Sikh school in the country. We have supported the campaign for the right to wear the kirpan—I thank the Minister for Transport for his help in overcoming the problems at airports—raised human rights issues in India, supported the protection of Sikh heritage and supported the work of Susan Strong at the Victoria and Albert museum. We have lobbied Governments on peace in the Punjab, the militarisation of the Punjab, the landmines issue and the nuclear threat. The group has had many successes and we aim to continue that work and to energise the debate on the future of the Sikh community in Britain. There is so much more for us to do, but there have been many Sikh successes to celebrate in politics, law, business, sport and the arts in this country.

I ask Members to go and see "Bend it Like Beckham", which was directed by Gurinder Chadha. It was filmed in my constituency at Yeading football club and celebrates both modernity and tradition in the Sikh community. Our role is to protect Sikhs against discrimination and unfair treatment, but it is also positively to celebrate the strength of a society in which cultural identity is protected, respected and celebrated.

9.57 am

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): It is a great privilege and pleasure to follow two speeches with which I agree completely. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) on initiating the debate and pay tribute to the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell). This is one of those rare and happy occasions on which hon. Members can be in almost total harmony, which is good.

I must declare my interest as chairman of the Conservative parliamentary friends of India, a group that seeks to represent all the diverse groups from the sub-continent. In the middle of the jubilee year, it is worth recalling that one of the Queen's greatest treasures is the Koh-i-noor diamond, which is a Sikh artefact. That issue was raised by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington in his speech in July last year, but we do not want to get into an Elgin-like discussion about the diamond's future. He said last year that Punjabi is the second most widely spoken language in the United Kingdom, which indicates the scale of the presence of the Punjabi and Sikh community. I look forward to joining representatives of the Sikh community later today when they present a petition to Downing street about the issue that we are debating today.

I do not regard myself as an expert on Sikhism, which my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge and the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington clearly are, and I do not know very much about the law, but I know something about natural justice. Given what the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington said about the 1983 judgment, the time has come for natural justice to take priority.

The 1983 judgment, about which I shall say more towards the end of my remarks if I have time, accepted that Sikhs are a definable ethnic group under the Race Relations Act 1976. That was the unanimous judgment of the five judges participating in the hearing. It is important to remember that we do not need a debate on that. British law has already been decided. The challenge nearly 20 years on is to make sure that it is fully implemented. In some ways, that is difficult because the actions of the British Government can be interpreted in different ways. I am in favour of proper recognition of Sikhs to enable such discrimination to be dealt with effectively by British society and its law.

There are separate states in India, but the Government's decisions do not apply across the board. If the Minister were told by his colleagues in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to be cautious on those grounds, I hope that he would dismiss such fears. We want to give effect to natural justice for British citizens. As my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge said, matters have become more acute since 11 September. Yesterday, a leading member of the Sikh community told me of the many upsetting and disturbing incidents that he has experienced since then.

We must face up to the fact that the British do not know a great deal about faith and religion these days. We are a secular society. The average British citizen does not know much about his historic Christian faith, never mind being able to distinguish between Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs. We face a challenge. People who have clearly defined visual characteristics—as practising Sikhs have—are likely to be a target for particular hostility. That is the experience of the Sikh community. In the post-11 September environment, we have to do even more to address its worries.

I welcome early-day motion 1464, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) who is to respond to the debate on behalf of the official Opposition. It wants British law to recognise Sikhs as a separate ethnic group. The best estimate of the number of Sikhs that their community can come up with is 700,000. Sadly, we do not have an accurate figure. The early-day motion urges the Government to give guidance so that public authorities are left in no doubt that Sikhs should be monitored separately to avoid unnecessary discrimination under the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000. I agree strongly with spirit of the early-day motion, which was why I was happy to add my signature to it.

The problem came to a head during the census last year, when Sikhs were not identified as a separate ethnic category on the form. To be fair to the Office for National Statistics, the pressure for the inclusion of Sikhs grew a little late in the day to enable them to be accommodated. However, the ONS ought to have realised that the 1983 judgment meant that Sikhs should have been defined separately. I hope that the next census form will do that, and that the ONS can make such a commitment early on.

The census form included a write-in campaign and respondents were allowed to identify separate categories. I believe that a significant number of members of the Sikh community took advantage of such an opportunity. I have been told that the Office for National Statistics may have to re-examine the forms with the possible view of listing the Sikh community separately after the event, because of the many write-in identifiers. If that takes place, it would be an interesting development. I hope that the Sikh community will be identified separately at the next census, as a result of which we shall have an accurate idea of the size of the community.

Given that other hon. Members wish to speak, I shall not labour the House of Lords judgment, but it is tremendously important that people understand how clear cut it was. A headmaster refused to admit a Sikh boy to his school unless the boy removed his turban and cut his hair. Not surprisingly, that was unacceptable to the boy and his father. A court action failed, and an appeal failed. Rightly, the Commission for Racial Equality took the case to the House of Lords, and was, in effect, the appellant. The judgment of Lord Fraser of Tullybelton stands most careful reading today. I recommend it to hon. Members. I have the website address for the full judgment if they require it. As the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington highlighted, Lord Fraser said:

> "I recognise that 'ethnic' conveys a flavour of race but it cannot in my opinion have been used in the 1976 Act in a strict racial or biological sense."

Lord Fraser then defined separate characteristics, and it is worth putting them on record:

> "For a group to constitute an ethnic group in the sense of the 1976 Act, it must, in my opinion, regard itself, and be regarded by others, as a distinct community by virtue of certain characteristics."

He defined the characteristics of such a community as: a long shared history; a cultural tradition of its own; a common geographical origin or descent from a small number of common ancestors; a common language, not necessarily peculiar to the group; a common literature peculiar to the group; or a common religion different to that of neighbouring groups. Interestingly, he includes

> "being a minority or being an oppressed or a dominant group within a larger community, for example a conquered people (say, the inhabitants of England shortly after the Norman conquest) and their conquerors might both be ethnic groups."

He drew heavily on British history, which is right and proper given the thorough integration of the Sikh community into British life.

Lord Fraser quoted the opinion of a county court judge, who said:

> "The evidence in my judgment shows that Sikhs are a distinctive and self-conscious community. They have a history going back to the fifteenth century. They have a written language which a small proportion of Sikhs can read but which can be read by a much higher proportion of Sikhs than of Hindus. They were at one time politically supreme in the Punjab."

Lord Fraser then concluded, crucially:

> "The result is, in my opinion, that Sikhs are a group defined by a reference to ethnic origins for the purpose of the 1976 Act, although they are not biologically distinguishable from the other peoples living in the Punjab. That is true whether one is considering the position before the partition of 1947, when the Sikhs lived mainly in that part of Punjab that is now Pakistan, or after 1947, since when most of them have moved into India."

That clear and categorical judgment was supported by Lord Edmund-Davies, Lord Roskill, Lord Brandon and Lord Templeman. The latter gave a thoughtful judgment of his own in response to the issues raised during the case. I hope that the Government will now move to ensure that Sikhs get the recognition and status that they deserve, and that any doubts that Sikhs may have are properly addressed. That is not a criticism of the Government, because my party was in power for a long period after that judgment.

I conclude by agreeing with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington. I am afraid that I have not yet seen "Bend it Like Beckham"; I was too busy to catch it at the cinema. However, my wife tells me it is an absolutely brilliant film—although she resented going to see it on her own—and I look forward to seeing it on video. The Sikh community has contributed so much to British life and society, and to the economy, law and industry. Wherever we look, there is huge success to celebrate. If Sikhs want legal recognition, we should give it to them.

10.7 am

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in the debate. Some of my constituents want to lobby me about the Sikh agenda this afternoon; I am disappointed that I will not be able to join them, as I have secured an important meeting with the Prime Minister about the lack of housing in south-east England. I am afraid that, on this occasion, he trumps them. I am therefore glad to put my views on record, and I hope that those colleagues who will be able to speak to my constituents can share those views with them. Many of our constituents will be here this afternoon to press the issue of the ethnic monitoring of the Sikh community and the effective representation of Sikhs in public life in Britain.

I shall address colleagues—I refer to all hon. Members who have spoken, even those who have not yet seen "Bend it Like Beckham", although they should—on three crucial issues, but there are many others that I could raise. Those issues are Sikh identity, the Punjabi language and the tension between India and Pakistan. The latter is having a dangerous impact on the Punjab, and is a real problem for that part of the world. It is incumbent on those of us who could do something to reduce tension between those countries to do our best to do so.

The Punjab is being littered with mines because of the tension between India and Pakistan, and that means that the lives of children and farmers who have nothing to do the conflict and are not engaged with either side are at risk. Although I do not believe that Britain can leave the 50-year conflict to reach a conclusion, we may be able to use our good offices to ensure that our old friends India and Pakistan work together, rather than against each other.

I have many Punjabis in my constituency. The majority are probably Sikh, but a substantial minority are Muslim. Both Sikhs and Muslims are concerned about the future of the Punjab. That is an issue for which we all have a particular responsibility, because of our particular responsibility for peace.

I shall discuss the issue of Sikh identity, because we have reached a good moment to make progress. As many hon. Members know, I have pressed for more effective legislation to deal with religious, as well as racial, discrimination. It is a failure of United Kingdom law that to date it has not dealt with religious discrimination. The consequence has been that various different forms of religious discrimination persist.

The Sikh community is in some ways uniquely privileged, because of the House of Lords judgment, to which many hon. Members referred, which recognises that Sikhs should be regarded as an ethnic group. They can therefore secure protection for religious practices under the Race Relations Act—although, as the debate has highlighted, sometimes the practice has not sufficiently underpinned proper protection from discrimination.

With the changes happening in Europe and the wider global community, now is the time to confront the range of discrimination more intelligently. I welcome the current consultation on new mechanisms for dealing with discrimination. Issues raised in the debate should feed into that. The forms of discrimination that the Sikh community faces include not only discrimination on the basis of race or issues such as we have heard about recently, relating to how Sikhs have been targeted for racial attack following 11 September for wearing turbans, for example. The discrimination also includes specific limitations on religious practices by employers who prohibit turbans or the wearing of a kirpan, and other institutions that do not allow faith practices that are essential for the Sikh community to operate properly. We need to recognise that, do the ethnic monitoring that all hon. Members who have spoken so far support, and work in a way that can more effectively challenge those forms of discrimination.

Racists understand the situation. I remember vividly a racial attack on a schoolboy in my constituency that consisted of having his hair cut off. The consequence of that for an adherent of the Sikh faith is much more significant than it would be for anyone else, and the racists who attacked him knew it. To date, we have muttered good-will noises but have not delivered. The time has come for us to do so.

I focus finally on the Punjabi language. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) said that the Punjabi language is the second most spoken language in England. On Friday, just after I had cracked my elbow, which is now in a sling, I was privileged to attend a jubilee celebration in the Milan centre in my constituency. It was a day of music, dancing and poetry led by Sikh residents and other members of the community in Slough. I also had the privilege of making a speech although, because I had just cracked my elbow and had not been able to get to accident and emergency, it did not feel like a privilege at the time.

As I looked around the audience, I said, "I cannot do something that you can all do. I can only speak one language and all of you speak two, three or even four." When I heard all the languages that my constituents could speak, I realised some of the richness of the south Asian cultures that we celebrate today.

The Punjabi language has a wonderful tradition of poetry and communication that I am glad continues to be celebrated. There is an essential action that the Government should take to assist in that celebration—they should allow more community radio stations to broadcast in Punjabi. I want to use the platform offered by this debate to press the case for that language to be broadcast. Temporary licences are often granted to Apna Punjab radio to coincide with Vaisakhi in Slough. That is one example of how broadcasting in Punjabi can strengthen a community and grant access to vital cultural, health and other information to people who do not have fluent access to English. It can bring a community together.

Britain's great strength is its diversity. It is the joy of our country that we have learned to celebrate and include the diversity of other cultures. As hon. Members commented, during the recent sad events following the death of the Queen Mother, we saw the Koh-i-noor gleaming in the Hall next door. Although there are issues about where that diamond should rest, our national culture celebrates the cultures of many countries around the world. The Koh-i-noor is an example of how we do that. We must ensure that that continuing celebration includes reflecting those many cultures in our broadcast media as well as in events such as the jubilee celebration that I was able to attend in Slough.

Mr. Khalid Mahmood (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I agree with much of what has been said by hon. Members this morning, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) who mentioned the Punjab and Punjabis in relation to the current tension between India and Pakistan.

As we all recognise and understand, Sikhs are predominantly a proud race and have been involved in the military for a long time. Their presence in the armed forces in India—they are also present in the British armed forces—means that they suffer in two ways in any dispute: because they serve in the front line as soldiers and, as my hon. Friend said, because of the way that the geographic area that crosses both countries is divided. It was divided when we drew the lines that separated the majority of the religious sites that are now in Pakistani Punjab away from more than 2.5 million people going back to India. Those are some of the issues that link us with the heritage and people of the Sikh community in this country that we must address.

The current conflict raises issues to do with the Sikh community in Kashmir, and they must also be addressed. President Clinton visited the region a few years ago; at that time more than 30 Sikhs were massacred. When such atrocities take place, independent human rights organisations must be allowed to go there and verify what has happened. It is important for the Sikh community that such things are addressed.

I turn to softer issues. Many hon. Members have looked clinically at matters such as law and the Sikh community, and its legal standing. There are 19 million Sikhs in the world, and more than 700,000 of them live in this country. The Sikh religion has existed for more than 700 years. It has a long heritage in the Indian sub-continent, and a unique tradition and culture. It also has its own language. Such facts must be recognised.

We are debating the recognition of the Sikh community. Unfortunately, I will not support early-day motion 1464; I will amend it slightly. It rightly calls for protection from discrimination, but the provision of services for the Sikh community must also be addressed. Discrimination is an important issue, but the idea behind monitoring by local authorities is that the communities that are being monitored are catered for. Certain things must be provided to the Sikh community, particularly with regard to Sikh men, elderly care homes and the religious needs of elderly people who reside in them, and education for young Sikhs. Therefore, although negative subjects such as discrimination must be addressed, a positive approach should also be adopted so that we can address how better to service the Sikh community. That is the agenda that should be promoted.

I support this debate because I want the Sikh community to be integrated into this society. If young Sikh men and women are to feel a part of society, it is important that they are first proud of their own heritage, culture and religion. Once they feel at ease with their own identity, it will be easier for them to play a role in the society that they live in, and are very much a part of.

Sikhs play an important role in all walks of life; they work for local authorities, the police and the armed forces.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): I rise to emphasise my hon. Friend's point. I assure him that the Sikh community is already playing an important role in this country. That is certainly the case in my city of Wolverhampton, where Sikhs play an important practical role in ensuring good cultural and race relations: they make a considerable contribution to the inter-faith group, and they work with the local authority and other organisations throughout the city. Therefore, we are already achieving my hon. Friend's objectives.

Mr. Mahmood: I thank my hon. Friend for that timely intervention, and I acknowledge the tremendous amount of work that he has done in conjunction with the Sikh community in his constituency. He might also have wished to point out that Gurbux Singh, the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality, hails from Wolverhampton. I am sure that both of my hon. Friends from Wolverhampton will be proud of that fact.

The young in the Sikh community must be proud of who they are, what they are and how they exist. They have a visual presence—their religion and wearing of the turban and beard makes them easily identified—that has led to mistaken identification by several people who are illiterate about religion post-11 September. That has caused the Sikh community to be subjected to religious abuse, which is totally the wrong sentiment and demonstrates the ignorance of some people. We must clarify the issues.

If the young people understand their own heritage and culture, they may integrate further into society and play a better part in building up the multiracial and multi-religious country that the United Kingdom has become. I would support that.

It has been said—I go back to matters relating to the CRE—that the Sikh community has already been recognised as a visible community under race relations legislation. We must take forward recognition by national Government, local government and public bodies that deliver services for the Sikh community. Services must be delivered equally. Once it is defined that a community must be addressed through the census, we must find out how many Sikh people live in this country and decide how we can address their issues and fulfil their needs.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a need for language teaching in the Sikh community? It is important to foster that not only for that community, but for the country as a whole. People who speak two languages are often quicker at adapting to an additional language than people who speak only one. If we encouraged language teaching, it would help our society as well as Sikhs within it.

Mr. Mahmood: I welcome my hon. Friend's contribution. I agree that speaking mother-tongue languages is essential for allowing anyone in this country to grasp the context of their history, culture and identity, and to play a better role in the society that we have developed. We must take forward the positive aspects of the society, and the Sikh community has done that with regard to the Vaisakhi festivals. We have a fantastic Vaisakhi festival in Birmingham—

Mr. Dennis Turner: And Wolverhampton.

Mr. Mahmood: And Wolverhampton, of course. I am sure that there is such a festival in Slough.

The way in which the Sikh community has projected itself is of credit. I wish all those who worked hard to secure the debate and hon. Members who work together on the issue well. I hope that we can continue to move forward. I tabled the amendment to the early-day motion purely because it is important to recognise such issues as delivery of services to the community. We should look not only at the negatives of discrimination, although I agree that that needs to be addressed, but, more importantly, the delivery of services to the Sikh community as a whole.

10.29 am

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): I join other hon. Members in thanking the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) for ensuring that we debate these matters at this time of year. Obviously, he and the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) come to the debate with huge constituency experience for which we are very grateful. I also thank the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington, who has been persistent and insistent in ensuring that the agenda is pursued more widely. It has indeed been pursued very effectively.

All of us who have spoken acknowledge our gratitude to the Sikhs for their contribution over many years and at all levels of society and in the public and private sectors. They have made it in teaching and business, and, as was said earlier, in the armed forces. They have also contributed with huge distinction to the public service more widely, and to education and culture. I have shared in many Sikh cultural events. I have not yet made my visit to the cinema, but it is on my list, so I shall have to join the queue.

The Sikhs have contributed in another way as well. They have led much of the religious and moral debate recently. Sikhism has made a huge contribution in that respect. Those of us who turn on our radios at 7.50 am often hear Inderjit Singh, but the Sikh community has contributed more generally, both by putting its religious perspective in a multi-faith context and by organising its own events.

Let me also thank the community for all the hospitality it has offered my colleagues and me over the years. I was privileged to attend the great festival event that took place at the Albert hall a couple of years ago, and also the great festival event in Birmingham, so I have seen the community at its proudest and best.

The debate is particularly well timed because of the lobby organised by the Sikh community that will take place later today. Like others, I shall talk to friends, colleagues and constituents during the day. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), who prepared for the debate by tabling a series of questions. I shall let him pursue them at greater length, as I expect he may wish to; but I hope that the Minister realises that the answers given so far have been inadequate and that following the change of personnel in the Department we shall hear better answers.

A statutory instrument has been tabled. My colleagues and I have prayed against it, and are hoping to debate it shortly. It concerns the implementation of the Commission for Racial Equality code of practice. I prayed against it not because I oppose it—indeed, I promoted it, and organised events in the House to ensure that the consultation worked well—but in order to secure a debate about its effective operation at local level. I hope that we can discuss it with various ethnic groups in the next few days, before Parliament rises for the summer recess.

A number of points have been made by members of other parties, including the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), some of which I do not disagree with. I certainly agree with the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) that until peace and justice exist in the Punjab, there will not be happy Punjabi communities here or anywhere else. It makes me sad that, more than half a century after the partition of the Indian sub-continent, the international community has still not seen fit to use diplomatic and other pressures to resolve the problem. We seem to react only when tension mounts in India and Pakistan. The world gets excited then; but when the tension lessens, it seems to lose interest. I hope that we do much better in the near future, so that there can be a fair resolution.

I hope that the Minister will take seriously the criticism that at present we have no adequate information about the Sikh community here. The questions asked by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, among others, could be answered if the Government set their mind to it. It is not possible to plan services and respond to the needs of a community without knowing the facts and figures—not just how many people there are, but where they are in terms of, for instance, different areas of public services.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington and I were involved—he more than I—in ensuring that the Irish were included in the last census as a separate ethnic category. Hon. Members may remember that under the categories of ethnic group, there were only three in the white section, of which Irish is one. In the Asian-British section at the moment one has to be Indian, Pakistani, Bangladeshi, or of any other Asian background in a generalised way, and people can write in their own descriptions. I do not think that the census is anything like adequate yet because, if we think about the situation in our cities and local authorities, it does not give us the authoritative breakdown that we need to be able to plan services and respond to communities. There is no other authoritative local government census. For a 10-year period that is the only census we have, and it does not suffice. Although I realise that it is not his Department, I hope that, when the last census figures are produced later this year, the Minister will work with other Departments in ensuring that the next time we plan the census we have a more comprehensive set of options, which would include Sikh as an option in the Asian community section

The CRE is being helpful, and encouraging local authorities to conduct ethnic monitoring that goes beyond the census. I hope that all local authorities will sign up to that. I am sure that is the general wish. Of course, they can do that, but in the interim before the next census they may have to make their own calculation of the number of adults, retired people and young people, so that planning and provision can be arranged.

May I add to what the hon. Member for Slough said about the urgent need to get on with the second half of the equality agenda? We have at last updated the Race Relations Act 1976. I was privileged to be part of that process and to be involved in deliberations on the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000. That is all good and proper, but we have not yet returned to the separate, but holistic consideration of religious discrimination. Some of us did not want that to be part of the anti-terrorism legislation. I think we were right to remove it from the legislation. Terrorism and discrimination should not be seen as related issues, but religious discrimination does need to return to the agenda. Guarantees against religious discrimination are hugely important.

It is very important that we allow people to learn and speak Punjabi when they want to. There is a big danger. We had a debate some years ago in Committee under the Conservative Government about second languages in schools. We must retain the view that was canvassed then that it is perfectly acceptable for one's second or third school language to be an Asian language rather than a European one. It is much more practically useful for many people—white people as well as those of Asian origin—for their immediate second language to be the one that many in their community use so that they can trade, work and have good community relations. I hope that we can look again at the way in which we increase language teaching and give that an equal priority.

I end with the point that my Sikh friends make to me most often. The importance of recognition is not just to end discrimination, but to ensure that there can be full participation of Sikhs in the community. Whether one keeps the five Ks; whether one wears a turban; whether one wears a kirpan; whether one wears a tunic; whether one wears a bangle; all those things may produce a difference of perception. At worst, they can produce overt racism and antagonism, but unless we allow people who are sometimes second or third generation, or mixed race by background, to have as strong a link with their cultural hinterland as they do with their adopted country, they will feel driven back into a cultural ghetto. We want to share the benefits of the Sikh faith and tradition. To do that, all Sikhs in this country have to participate fully and feel proud and able to do that. That is why the issue is important, and the demands of the community must be heeded. They are not unreasonable; the community makes them persistently, but with good cause.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): First, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) for having raised this matter. It will perhaps come as no surprise to note that, looking around the Chamber, there is a geographical concentration of Members of Parliament from the west of London. The hon. Members for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) and for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) are here, as is my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge. Earlier, I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) was also present.

My constituency has a growing Sikh community, which is a reflection of Sikhs' economic success. They are now spread throughout the country and, through that, my interest in the matter has been awakened as I become aware of some of the issues that they face. I hope that today will provide an opportunity for the Minister to reply to some of the concerns that have been raised.

I am a lawyer and I started by looking at the Mandla case. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) so rightly summarised—I shall not repeat his words—the Mandla case said in the clearest and most unequivocal terms not that the Sikhs are a religious group but that they are an ethnic minority. I take that, therefore, as my starting point, because it means that Sikhs should be the full beneficiaries of all the provisions of the 1976 Act. There is a separate issue about the extent to which religious discrimination should be tackled in this country and I endorse what the hon. Member for Slough said on that point. We are going to wish to tackle that subject, but I want for a moment to concentrate on the here and now—the extent to which that protection, which was perhaps not expected or anticipated when the Act was passed in 1976 but which the courts quite clearly spelled out, has been made use of in practice.

From looking at what the CRE and the Government have said—I make this point with no hostility to the Minister, because the subject goes back to long before the Labour Government came into office in 1997, although I think that it has continued since—it seems that although recognition of Sikhs as a distinct ethnic minority group has been granted, the issue has always been slightly brushed under the carpet. That has happened on the basis that people can avail themselves of that recognition if they wish, but the Government and those there to promote good race relations do not seem to be very concerned about looking at the issue in great detail.

The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) was correct when he said that I was going to turn to my parliamentary questions. They were the next thing at which I looked. The answers that I have obtained during the past fortnight have been very illuminating—or not, as the case may be. First, although I acknowledge that a wide variety of people consider themselves to be Sikhs, some of them fulfilling all the criteria of the group and others not wishing to do so, which is one of the elements of diversity in our society, it is clear that the Sikh community in this country is very distinctive and has an ethnic and religious cohesion. Nevertheless, the Government have very little idea of how many Sikhs are in the United Kingdom. The Sikh community believes that there are about 700,000. If that is correct, it makes them one of the largest ethnic minority groups—not a group so small that it cannot be monitored adequately. Even if the Government are right with their figure of between 350,000 and 500,000 Sikhs, that still suggests a woolliness that will affect awareness of what the problems confronting them might be. That needs to be addressed.

Even more telling was the response to the question that I asked the Cabinet Office on how many public appointments are held by Sikhs. The answer, from the Minister in that Department, was:

> "My Department does not collect data on the number of Sikhs appointed to public appointments. It collects diversity data for public appointments on the following criteria: Bangladeshi; Black-African; Black-Caribbean; Black-any other; Indian; Pakistani; Chinese; mixed ethnic background; any other Asian; White; or any other ethnic background."—[Official Report, 25 June 2002; Vol. 387, c. 835W.]

I must say that when I read that, the point that the Sikh community is making immediately struck me. Looking back to my own past, I have Jewish forebears. The Jewish community in this country has never asked for monitoring, for reasons connected with their extraordinarily successful integration into this country's life. However, if my forebears who came to this country from eastern Europe in the 1830s had found a similar regime to help them as exists now, they might have been a little surprised if the then Government had decided to collect information on ethnic diversity on the basis of whether they were Ukrainian, Austro-Hungarian or from the Russian empire. That highlights the extent to which the Sikhs have been rather airbrushed out of existence by the Cabinet Office process. They see themselves as a distinctive community, and they are recognised as such under the race relations legislation. I believe that we could do better.

Many of the Sikhs whom I have met in the past few weeks have said that they sometimes feel that the categorisations derived from the colonial past mean that they do not enjoy the distinctive identity, monitoring and recognition that they merit. After all, they say, there are many hundreds of thousands of Sikhs, not just a few thousand, even if the Government do not have accurate statistical evidence. They say also that they are British Sikhs. One has only to meet members of the Sikh community to see the extent to which that is correct. Therefore, the classifications given by the Government—I am sure for the best historical reasons—no longer match the reality of the Sikhs' position in this country.

Hon. Members have made the point this morning, in their very helpful contributions, that the events of 11 September have meant that the Sikh community has been the target of acts of racial violence. I think that five gurdwaras were attacked, and there were other instances of violence against Sikhs and members of other ethnic minority communities in this country.

Clearly, that heightens the sense of concern. I do not want to be confrontational, because the Government's intentions are benevolent, but can we not move matters along a little? I should be grateful for an assurance from the Minister that the Government will look at the issue again, and get rid of the increasingly untenable definitions with which Departments are working with regard to ethnic minority issues.

I also hope that the CRE will show more flexibility. It also has been somewhat sclerotic and worried that greater concessions would open floodgates elsewhere. I do not understand that argument: in a pluralist society, communities that are large enough and have a separate identity ought to get the recognition and monitoring that they need, precisely because they need services.

[Mr. Dominic Grieve]

I can tell the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Mahmood) that I fully understand his criticism of the early-day motion, but I worded it very carefully. I wanted to concentrate on the legal issue that I believe to be untenable in terms of the race relations legislation. I share his desire that service provision should be better targeted.

Mr. Mahmood: I agree with what the hon. Gentleman has said, but might it not be possible to table another early-day motion that we can both support?

Mr. Grieve: I am sure that, if the hon. Gentleman were to table another early-day motion, I should be happy to consider it.

I want to hear from the Minister, so I shall take up no more of the short time left. Will the Minister say when the Government will meet representatives of the Sikh community? We hoped that that would happen a week or two ago, but the meeting seems to have been put off until 31 July. Will the Minister assure us that the meeting will take place and that the needs and representations of Sikhs will be addressed properly?

I look forward to a positive response from the Minister.

10.49 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Hilary Benn): First, I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) on initiating the debate and on the thoughtful speech with which he kicked off the discussion this morning. I also wish to associate myself with the expressions of appreciation for the work of the all-party group on the Punjabi community in Britain, and for the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) in establishing the group. He follows in a long tradition of hon. Members who have taken an interest in the position of the Sikh community, including someone whom I knew for many years, Sid Bidwell, the former hon. Member for Southall, who was especially distinguished in that regard.

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) described this debate as one of those all too rare occasions in Westminster Hall when there is a large degree of consensus. In my own relatively limited experience, that is not such a rare occurrence. I have often said that it is as if we enter a parallel universe when we come through the door of this Chamber.

Fiona Mactaggart: No, it is normal.

Hilary Benn: Indeed. We enter a parallel universe in which reason, knowledge and understanding predominate, rather than struggle to make themselves heard, which is what tends to happen in the main Chamber. As this debate demonstrates, it is reason, knowledge and understanding that underpin the diversity mentioned by so many hon. Members, and are the best protection against the type of ignorance that led to the attacks on members of the Sikh community in the wake of 11 September and will help us to grapple with our attempt to understand the nature of our society.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) made a good point. We are struggling to make the categories that we use to try and understand more about the nature of our society match the reality of its increasing diversity. It goes to the heart of answering the question, "What is our identity?" and it becomes more difficult to answer that question as we become more diverse. We must recognise that we are developing a process.

The Sikhs are a people with a long and proud history. That history led them to fight against the British, to fight alongside us in two world wars, and to continue to serve in armed forces around the world, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Mahmood) mentioned. I too have seen "Bend it Like Beckham" and it is wonderful, but, since we are in cultural mode, I would like to mention an interesting photographic exhibition currently run at Wellington Arch, on the history of service by the Sikh community in the armed forces.

The estimates of how many Sikhs are in Britain vary from 350,000 to 700,000, as the hon. Member for Beaconsfield suggested. Their history has led a large number of Sikhs to make their home in Britain and become an established part of our increasingly diverse society. That history led the historian J.S. Grewal to say:

> "The Sikh people subscribe to the idea of cultural coexistence. They can live in other cultures and don't really entertain hostility towards any people at all. This is the contribution they have made to world civilisation."

In every walk of life, Sikhs have contributed immensely to this country's social and economic well-being. It is especially appropriate that today we have an opportunity to celebrate and value that economic, cultural and social contribution to the stability and prosperity of British society as a whole.

Our relations—in the collective sense—with the Sikh community are extremely important, and all of us will continue to strive to improve them. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary may have had the example of British Sikhs in mind in a recent speech when he spoke about

> "providing a warm and lasting welcome to people who then become part of the country, have a sense of belonging, take on citizenship and work as we all should to ensure that that citizenship leads to mutuality and inter dependence."

All of us have a great deal to learn from the Sikh faith's teachings of the values of tolerance, equality and concern for others. Those are values that all hon. Members share.

I will now turn to specific points made in the course of the debate by the hon. Member for Uxbridge and others. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington referred to previous debates acknowledging progress that is being made. Many of the questions legitimately asked in this debate about our lack of information about the nature, make-up and number of the Sikh community will shortly be answered when we get the results of the 2001 census because, as hon. Members will be aware, that census was the first to include a question on religion. The religious categories are as follows: "none"—interestingly—at the top;

Christian; Buddhist; Jewish; Muslim; Sikh; and "others". Therefore, we will have the most complete data that there has ever been on the nature and make-up of the Sikh community.

That is the most significant single step that has been taken to learn more about the nature of that community. It will give us information about the size of the Sikh population—which will be measured by how many people identify themselves as Sikhs by ticking the appropriate box in answer to the religious question—as well as about household structure, type of accommodation, health, educational attainment, and employment. Those are the kinds of information that national Government and local government need to ensure that the services that are provided meet the needs of that community, in all its shape and forms.

As several hon. Members have said, there is also a write-in opportunity under the ethnic group category. I was lobbied by the substantial Kashmiri community in my constituency; it wanted to have separate recognition within the ethnic group classification. There was also a campaign to get a write-in in that section so that the word Sikh could be written under the Asian or Asian-British category. The ONS has said that it will look at all of the write-ins and endeavour to produce information based on what they provide. That will give us more of the sort of detailed information that we all want.

The listing of Sikh as a religion in the census will put the Sikh community in a very different position from all the other groups that were campaigning for separate recognition within the census, because it will provide us with many figures that we do not currently have. I hope that the next time we discuss this matter, I will be able to give the answers that are sought by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield—to whom I am about to give way.

Mr. Grieve: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I want to spare his blushes. Even at the Home Office, the ethnicity data currently use the 2001 categories of ethnic groups. As an effort should be made to keep one's one house in order, are steps going to be taken on that, so that Sikhs who are working in the Home Office can be identified properly?

Hilary Benn: That question points to an important issue that must be addressed by this society. The CRE code gives Sikhs the same status as other ethnic and racial groups. The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink)—who is no longer present—quoted from a letter from the CRE chairman. That letter confirms the legal recognition of Sikhs as both an ethnic and a religious group. Several hon. Members have referred to the Mandla v. Dowell Lee case. Therefore, Sikhs have the same status as all other ethnic and racial groups within the statutory code of practice, with regard to the duty to promote race equality under the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 that came into force by order on 31 May.

The CRE produced the code and the related non-statutory guidance. It shares the view that the fact that case law has established Sikhs as an ethnic group for the purposes of the Race Relations Act 1976 does not of itself justify it receiving different treatment from the many other ethnic and racial groups in the UK. However, the statutory code of practice encourages authorities, in using the same classification system as used in the 2001 census, to recognise, as the code does, that authorities may choose to collect more detailed information to reflect local circumstances. Indeed, I would expect them to do that.

I confirm that Lord Filkin will meet representatives of several Sikh organisations on 31 July to discuss these and other matters, and I hope that that will give an opportunity for people to respond to many of the other points that have been raised in the debate, including those that were made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington on the UN declaration and the ways in which its principles can be taken forward. I will ensure that Lord Filkin has a chance to read the debate before he takes part in that important meeting.

Trade Unions

11 am

Anne Picking (East Lothian): Thank you, Mr. Cook, for the opportunity to begin this Adjournment debate on the relationship between the Government and trade unions. I have been a Member of this place for a little more than a year, Mr. Cook—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. I would be remiss in my duties were I not to remind hon. Members that the House, in its wisdom or otherwise, decided when establishing the parallel Chamber that the four senior members of the Chairmen's Panel would be addressed as Mr. Deputy Speaker when they occupied the Chair.

Anne Picking: Forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not know that because I have been in this place for only a little more than a year and this is my first Adjournment debate. Whoever advised me on the issue will feel my wrath later.

My securing the debate is poetic justice, because I would not be here to represent the good people of East Lothian were it not for the trade union movement. I come from a solid, committed and staunch trade union background. My family is steeped in the history of the principles of trade unionism, and I come from the dynasty of Moffats who founded the Scottish National Union of Mineworkers. Before I started work, my dad's advice was to join the union. The importance of those words strikes me only now. Then, I simply did as I was told—people did what their dads told them—without realising the significance of the advice.

My dad knew, but I did not, that if I joined a union I would have protection, a safety net, pals, workmates and, most importantly, support. When someone becomes a worker, with no knowledge of the real world, they enter a new situation in life and become part of a new regime. They look for a friendly face and want to be part of something. They want to belong, so they join a club called a trade union. Then they learn about a collective voice and how it can influence change. All I want is a commitment from the Government to utilise the sheer effectiveness of that powerful and positive part of today's work force.

I dissociate myself from elements in the trade union movement, and the Labour movement as a whole, who choose to play games, refuse to move on and want to relinquish meaningful dialogue with the Government. However, I expect the Government to uphold the values of the trade union movement, the spirit in which it was formed and the fundamental role that it has achieved to influence society and government.

This place is the heartland of democracy, and it is bulging at the seams with the likes of lawyers and members of the intelligentsia. There is a place for such people here but, equally and arguably even more so, there should be a place for trade unionists such as me who have lived in the harsh front line. I was a nurse and I had to make decisions that affected people's lives. I have worked in Scotland, England and Northern Ireland, the majority of those years during the Thatcher reign. I use that word because she reigned supreme, with contempt and no regard for the workers and their representatives, the trade unions.

I joined the Confederation of Health Service Employees as opposed to other unions because it represented all health workers, not only the supposed elite—the clinicians. All the workers were equally important in my union. I could not do my job effectively as a nurse if the wards were dirty or the patients were not fed, and the team element is crucial. We had to work collectively to succeed, and we did so during the dark days of Thatcher, who tried systematically to dismantle and destroy our movement.

It was divide and conquer, and Thatcher picked a few of us off, but she could never shut down the movement. The miners and steelworkers are almost gone, but their legacy remains intact. The workers still have rights, and employers and Governments must respect that. They should nurture and value the work force, who are their greatest commodity. It should not matter whether someone is a high flier with degrees and qualifications that they could paper the wall with; all members of working teams should be valued equally. It is unthinkable that workers under this Government should be treated differently or unfairly because of the job they do, and any two-tier work force scenario is unacceptable.

I applaud the concept of people being paid the right rate for the job, and it is just that they have the right to be rewarded for specialist knowledge, ability and skills. When workers' rights are determined by the job that they do, however, those responsible are guilty of gross discrimination. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will lay my concerns to rest in the interests of working together, true partnership and healthy relationships.

The trade union movement is at the core of this Government, and it founded the Labour party. As a member and past president of Unison, I ask the Government for fairness, not favours, and for an open door, and that they do not simply forget where they came from.

11.6 am

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) on securing the debate. This is a fortuitous time to discuss the partnership between Governments and trade unions, and I hope that few hon. Members think that there is no place for decent representation of the work force or for trade unions that look after their workers without becoming politically motivated. Similarly, I hope that we value everyone in the workplace. Whatever job they do—however menial or high-powered—everyone in society has a role, and I think that I speak for every member of my party when I say that.

There has been a long and fruitful partnership between the Government and the trade unions. Indeed, as hon. Members will know, yesterday's edition of The Times notes that > "it was in order to protect railway workers that the Labour Party had been established . . . It was the railwaymen of those days who took the lead at the Farringdon Hall meeting of February 1900"—

102 years ago—

> "in the effort to set up a Labour Representation Committee".

Sadly, the long and fruitful partnership between the Government and the trade unions ended this week. The National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers—the railway workers' heirs—broke its link with the Government, and I am sure that we all share the grief of those involved.

I want to focus on the links between the Deputy Prime Minister and the RMT, which go back 47 years—almost half the life of the Labour party. Sadly, he resigned from the RMT last week because he was furious that it had attempted to dictate how MPs voted. It is reasonable, however, to ask how long it has been attempting to do that.

Jimmy Knapp, now sadly deceased, was head of the RMT for 15 years, and was very vocal in leading strikes on the railways in the 1980s. He was also very politically motivated against the Thatcher Government. He once wrote to me—I do not know why, because I was not even a member of the Conservative party at the time—that it was important to have guards on trains. That was a union issue, and there are good reasons for having guards on trains. I had travelled to Kent the previous day, and the guard spent the entire journey with his feet up, reading the Beano. When I asked for his help, he looked at me as if I was mad, and went back to reading the Beano. Leaving that to one side, however—[Interruption.] Labour Members' mutterings perhaps reflect their sympathies for the people with their feet up reading the Beano, which I have not read for many years.

I return to the close relationship between the Government and the RMT. In 1970, the Deputy Prime Minister moved into his flat at Clapham common. Naturally, the union wanted to support its sponsored Members and gave them subsidised accommodation in what is now Maritime house—it was then National Union of Seaman house.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the relationship between the RMT and the Deputy Prime Minister and the question of who receives money and who does not has come to light only because of legislation introduced by this Government? Tory Governments never introduced legislation to bring transparency and show who influenced the Tory party.

Mr. Robathan: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raises that point about legislation, because he is factually incorrect. The requirement for declarations under the Register of Members' Interests goes back long before 1997. That is one of the points that I wish to discuss.

On the subject of legislation, the hon. Gentleman may be interested to hear that newspaper reports say that the Deputy Prime Minister stands to benefit by some £15,000 under the Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rent) Order 1999. That is not bad for a relationship between the Deputy Prime Minister and the union that is supposed to have ended.

In 1974, the Deputy Prime Minister moved from the flat that he took in 1970. He has a controlled tenancy that costs £220 a month. He does not use that flat, but he retains it. I wonder sometimes, when Labour Members go on about homelessness, whether they think that someone who has grace and favour homes in Admiralty arch and in Dorneywood in Buckinghamshire—

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is the normal practice of the House that a Member who raises another Member's personal circumstances or even mentions his name in the House gives notice to that Member so that he can respond. Will you clarify whether that practice has been followed in this case?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That practice is the normal courtesy, but there is no rule in Standing Orders or in "Erskine May" requiring a Member so to do. It would be most unusual for reference to be made without prior notice being given, but it is not necessary for the Member to be present to hear that reference.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Your ruling is informative, but may we ascertain from the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) whether he took that step, which you describe as not obligatory, but usually followed as a matter of courtesy?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the House that it is not up to the Speaker or Deputy Speaker to tell Members what to say. However, I am sure that note has been taken of hon. Members' comments and that, if they are patient, they will hear something to that effect.

Mr. Robathan: I am happy to answer. On many occasions, I have let the Deputy Prime Minister know that I am raising the issue, but he has not attended when I have done so. When I met him in a corridor recently and said, "Good morning, John," his only response was to say, "You—" I shall not say exactly what he said, because he was not particularly polite. In fact, I do not think that he is particularly interested in the fact that I have raised the issue. It is in the public domain, however, and it was in yesterday's newspapers—and, I suspect, today's. The person involved is not a menial Back Bencher, but the Deputy Prime Minister. The issue is one of national interest.

John McDonnell: Are we to understand from what the hon. Gentleman says that he did not inform the Deputy Prime Minister that he would raise the issue in debate?

Mr. Robathan: I do not have to answer that question, but the hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that I have not done that. It is interesting that Labour Members are so sensitive to the issue. Perhaps they, too, feel extraordinary guilt—

John McDonnell rose—

Mr. Robathan: Sit down. Perhaps Labour Members feel guilty that, while they rabbit on about homelessness, one among their number earns more than £100,000 a year, has two grace-and-favour residences and his own house in Hull, but still sees fit to accept a controlled tenancy from a trade union worth £15,000 a year.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robathan: Go on, I'll let you have a go as well.

John Robertson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that his contribution, which, so far, has lasted eight minutes, is a personal attack on the Deputy Prime Minister and has nothing to do with trade unions?

Mr. Robathan: I am sure that if I were out of order, the Deputy Speaker would have pulled me up. Labour

[Mr. Robathan]

Members keep raising points of order and I have given way to them. I have nothing against the Deputy Prime Minister. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh, but perhaps they should try to justify the situation in which house prices are rocketing because of shortages. Indeed, they have referred to that.

John Robertson: Is it a trade union matter?

Mr. Robathan: I shall return to the matter in hand—the relationship between trade unions and the Government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am most grateful.

Mr. Robathan: The Deputy Prime Minister, the Leader of the House and others have resigned from the RMT because, they say, they were put under pressure to abide by rules dictated by Mr. Crow, the new leader of that union. What did Mr. Crow expect, when he asked them to pledge support on four issues: renationalising the railways, repeal of anti-union laws, scrapping of the part-privatisation of the London underground and actions to halt job losses in the shipping industry? He said that he would support 14 left wingers who pledged support for the RMT's manifesto, although I do not know whether any are present. Perhaps the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington is one.

John McDonnell: If the hon. Gentleman is about to distort the process of the RMT's discussions with the Labour party and Labour MPs, I am happy to intervene and explain what went on. That might take a few minutes, if you are happy for me to do so, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The relationship is not one in which any Member of Parliament has been browbeaten, threatened or bribed in any way. I also suggest that, as a matter of courtesy, the hon. Gentleman should have informed the RMT members who are part of that group that he wanted to raise the matter, so that they could be present and respond.

Mr. Robathan: I would have spent the past week writing to members of the Labour party. That is an absurd comment, and I look forward to the hon. Gentleman telling us in his speech whether he has received RMT sponsorship.

In responding to interventions, I have made all my points except to say that it is extraordinary and bizarre that, under this particular Government, with their partnership with trade unions, a man who is paid well over £100,000 a year is able to accept such a benefit and that the Labour movement is not appalled by such behaviour.

I draw the analogy with the Conservative Government allowing people to buy council houses. What would have been the response if the Minister involved lived in a council house and was able to buy it at a knockdown price? Yet, the Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rent) Order 1999, introduced by the Deputy Prime Minister, has allowed him to benefit from the controlled tenancy of his flat to the tune of some £15,000 per year. One or two Labour Members look a little wry. Perhaps they are thinking about the Labour movement's long partnership, since 1900, with railway workers, trade unions and the Labour party—now the Government—and wondering whether that is what is was all set up for.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have no wish to restrict the tone or the extent of the debate, so long as comments are kept within its title. However, a number of hon. Members have written in about catching my eye. Time is limited. It is now 19 minutes after 11 o'clock and we normally allow the three Front Benchers 30 minutes before we conclude. I ask all hon. Members to restrict their comments and make them pertinent, and to resist the urge to allow meaningless interventions, although, as they will not know that an intervention is meaningless until they hear it, they should resist taking any.

Mr. John Lyons (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I welcome this Adjournment debate, and I thank my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) for introducing it. I want to focus on partnership working in the United Kingdom in the private and public sectors; it is more relevant to employees than the partnership between the leaders of the Labour party and of the trade unions. People are interested in what partnership means to them in their place of work and they want to know how effective it can be.

Partnership has brought positive achievements in industrial relations: it has been very successful in such a short time, its strength lies in the fact that it embraces employers and employees, it has mutuality at its centre, it relies on trust and it is embraced by employers' organisations as well as the Trades Union Congress, the Scottish Trades Union Congress and the Wales Trades Union Congress, so it has the broad support of trade unions and industry.

The objective of partnership working is to improve industrial relations, and we would all welcome that, irrespective of where it happened. Partnership is about trying to develop a workplace culture; it is about learning and about facing issues jointly rather than trade unions and employers working against each other. I compliment the Department for Trade and Industry on its efforts to encourage employers and trade unions to work together on the many issues faced by British workers in the private and public sectors. People want to discuss the issues that affect them—the balance between work and life, flexible working, hours of work, pay, and everything else that would normally be on the agenda for discussion between trade unions and employers. They welcome the fact that the Department of Trade and Industry is prepared to fund employer and trade union efforts to confront such issues.

Partnership working is a step change from the industrial relationships of the 1980s and 1990s, and it has allowed us to move away from the struggle and mayhem that characterised industrial relations in the 1980s. I welcome that change.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Harrow, West): My hon. Friend refers to the difficult industrial relations climate of the 1980s, and he may be aware of a throwback to that time in a case that came before the European Court of Human Rights—a number of trade unionists claimed that their employers discriminated against them. Does he welcome the court's ruling, which was made yesterday, that they were discriminated against for refusing to sign individual contracts or to give up collective bargaining? Does he share my view that the Government must urgently consider what action needs to be taken to prevent further discrimination against trade unionists?

Mr. Lyons: I welcome that decision, and I welcome the fact that trade unions can challenge such infringements throughout the UK, and not only legally. Yesterday, in a debate in this Chamber, we heard about workers being forced against their religious or individual beliefs to work on Sundays. It is important that we counter that in parallel, both in legal terms and in the workplace.

I am interested in partnership working because it moves on from the jargon of human resource management and the agenda of the 1980s and 1990s. It secures mutuality between trade unions and employers—each should recognise the other, which is the key to partnership working. The evidence so far confirms that major benefits will be available in the private and public sectors for those who use partnership working. It can be used in the private sector, and a range of public sector employers are involved, such as local government, the health service and even the voluntary sector. That is to be encouraged.

I would never come to such a debate claiming that partnership working faces no problems. The opposite is true. A new system of industrial relations will of course have problems, but it should not be rejected because of them. The problems should be examined and investigated to clarify how systems can be improved.

A survey on partnership working in the health service was conducted in the Greater Glasgow area at a hospital in a constituency neighbouring my own. A lot of my constituents work there and it is probably typical of large acute hospitals in major UK towns and cities. The survey found several positive features: it confirmed that staff enjoy working in the health service, that they like the work that they do and that they enjoy the atmosphere of the hospital. It also confirmed that they are happy, overall, with communication, which is the key to partnership working.

We must not fall into the trap of working from the top down and saying to people, "That's your instruction, now get on with it." Managers must listen to employees—there needs to be a reverse system through which information can flow from the bottom to the top, so that managers can be told where things go right and where they go wrong. It is good that that has been highlighted and that there is a focus on it.

Staff referred to partnership working, as they do not just want memos every other day about what the employer would like to happen. They want face to face meetings with managers so that there can be a two-way process and genuine dialogue between employees and employers and between trade unions and employers. Through such dialogue, managers can listen to the views of those who are to some extent the experts—the people who deliver the service or the product. That must be taken on board.

The health service is in good fettle, because partnership working is increasing every day, every week and every month and there is a secure work force situation. However, the survey points not just to successes, but to difficulties. Staff are critical, saying that there is not enough training and development in most hospitals, and that training and development seem to revolve around people's expertise and knowledge of a particular job. The survey confirms that people want a much broader approach to education in the work force. They believe that lifelong learning should be not just jargon for managers, but realistic for everyone in the health service.

Partnership working is being employed across the UK in every part of the health service and of local government and in major parts of the private sector. People want greater awareness of it. There is no point establishing forums in either the public or the private sector and expecting people to sign up to them. People have an expectation, which they want confirmed by their employer, that partnership is essentially about listening and mutuality between employer and employee.

Under partnership working, nothing is imposed—there is discussion and agreement. People will feel much safer in that situation. The fact that the TUC, the STUC and the WTUC have signed up to partnership working is its greatest strength, and I shall continue to support it. The DTI should come to the House and brief Members about partnership working so that they can tell their constituents how important and valuable it is.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: At the risk of displaying my anxiety, I remind the House that there are only 32 minutes left before I must move to the Front-Bench winding-up speeches. Hon. Members should bear that in mind in determining the length of their contributions and the number of interventions that they permit.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I will try to be brief. I begin by declaring an interest, as a former member of the National and Local Government Officers Association, the National Union of Public Employees and Undeb Cenedlaethol Athrawon Cymru—I must make that clear for Hansard. My family has a tradition of union membership. My grandfather was a shop steward at the quarry of Chwarel Carreg y Llam, and, in the way that we do such things in Wales, he was known not by his proper name of John Williams, but as John yr Undeb—John the Union. I take particular pride in that.

During this and other debates, we shall hear hon. Members sitting to my right say that new Labour is in hock to the unions. May I leap to new Labour's defence and make it completely clear that new Labour is in no way the unions' special friend? That was confirmed by no lesser a personage than the Chancellor, when he spoke about vested interests on the Today programme on 26 June. He said that he would take on > "vested interests ... whether it's the unions themselves or the other restrictive practices that exist in our economy".

[Hywel Williams]

I find it odd that the Chancellor groups unions with other restrictive practices, but I am sure that he can explain himself. I hope that those few points have put an end to the reprehensible accusation that new Labour is the friend of the unions, and I now turn to more serious matters.

To illustrate my argument, I shall refer briefly to new Labour's Employment Relations Act 1999 and its operation in respect of an industrial dispute at Friction Dynamex in my constituency. I understand that this is the first time that new and welcome provisions in the Act relating to the protection of employees in a legitimate dispute have been put to a practical test. I say "welcome", and that is entirely the case in general, but the particular issue here, which the sacked workers have had to face, is the rule in the 1999 Act that allows an employer to sack workers in dispute after eight weeks—the so-called eight-week rule.

I do not intend to go into detail about the case, especially as it is the subject of investigation by an industrial tribunal, but after lengthy, fruitless and, some would say, pointless negotiation with the employer, the workers went on a legal strike—one week out, one week in. The workers are not hot-headed extremists. I know many of them personally and they are responsible people, some of whom have been employed at the factory for as long as 35 years. The union was always ready to negotiate seriously, but when the workers returned to work—I accompanied them early that morning when they decided to go back—the employer came to the gate to lock them out personally. The strike continued and the union continued to press the case and tried to negotiate, but got no serious response, and the workers were all sacked after eight weeks. That is how the situation stands after 63 weeks on the picket line.

The workers are out. They have the overwhelming support of the community and of others from trade unions and political parties far and wide. They are waiting for their case to be heard by the tribunal, but that will not happen until October, so the practical effect of the eight-week rule, introduced by new Labour, is 63 weeks on the picket line and a wait until October.

The question for us to consider is how the eight-week rule came about. The aim of the Act, according to the Secretary of State in the White Paper, is to > "promote the best of modern employment relationships in all our companies, encouraging a culture of fairness and trust in the workplace."

Like previous speakers, I commend that aim. According to the Prime Minister, the Act was introduced to > "replace the notion of conflict between employers and employees with the promotion of partnership—"

Another laudable aim. At paragraph 4.22, the White Paper states:

> "Government believes that in general employees dismissed for taking part in lawful organised official industrial action should have the right to complain of unfair dismissal to a tribunal."

However, it contains no mention of a timeframe for dismissal.

The Government called for views to be expressed. The opinion of the Confederation of British Industry is direct, as it specifically suggested that > "any legislation in this area must specify that the fairness of dismissal should be assessed solely against established criteria, and not in light of whether the industrial action itself was justified."

In other words, the particular circumstances of the case should not be taken into account. The CBI proposed that employers should be able to put their employees on notice of, say, 28 days, but that further participation in the strike would lead to dismissal. That proposal is the first mention of a time limit in relation to industrial action. The TUC, however, argued that dismissing a striking employee should be automatically unfair. Which side prevailed?

In a letter to the CBI and the TUC, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said:

> "We will also provide protection for those engaged in lawfully organised official industrial action. It will be automatically unfair to dismiss employees for the first eight weeks of the action."

The period was not 28 days, but it certainly was not unlimited. The Secretary of State continued:

> "Thereafter dismissal will be fair provided that the employer has taken all reasonable procedural steps to resolve the dispute."

That is how the situation lies for the Friction Dynamex workers.

The Secretary of State's statement is the first available confirmation that we have found that the Government have adopted the eight-week timetable for unfair dismissal. Although he gave no reasons for their decision, and although there was little debate in the Chamber or in the other place in 1998, the timetable is one component of the White Paper on which the Government requested views. As I have outlined, we knew who was in favour of a time limit, and it was certainly not the unions.

I should make it clear, however, that there has been much criticism of the eight-week rule from some Labour Members, and I commend them for their consistency and their commitment to a just system.

I end my brief contribution with a quote from Bill Morris, general secretary of the Transport and General Workers Union:

> "It is regrettable that the employers' amendments, clearly designed to wreck the principles of fairness and social justice in the workplace, have been accommodated."

They were accommodated by a new Labour Government and by the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), who is the architect of the new Labour project.

David Hamilton (Midlothian): I, too, shall be brief. I may be one of the 16 Labour Members mentioned by the RMT, but I still have not been informed about that and, like most people, I have only read about recent events in the papers. The differences between various trade unions and the leadership of the Labour party and the Government will continue, because that is how things will be. The unions are there to a do a job and to protect the interests of the people they represent, and that is as it should be. Let us go back a bit, however, and think about the trade union movement.

I come from a mining background, and I spent 20 years in the coal industry. I came through a national dispute and was sacked for my troubles. It is laughable for Opposition Members to talk about trade unions being political, because the Conservatives took political decisions to take out trade unions. When the Conservatives were in opposition in 1979, the Ridley report said that they would have to take one or two trade unions out to defeat the trade union movement, and they knew that opposition in the House would not be enough. They had to take the trade union and labour movements out because they saw them as the real offenders.

The Ridley report made it clear that the dockers' union posed a problem because it could stifle the country, and the Conservatives realised that legislation would have to be changed so that it could not do so. The miners were identified as the vanguard of the movement, and unfortunately for me—or perhaps not, given that I am here in this place—I was one of the casualties.

Mr. Robathan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

David Hamilton: I might come back to the hon. Gentleman later.

In fact, the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), or perhaps it is Blabby—[Hon. Members: "Blaby."] Perhaps it is Blether, but never mind. The hon. Gentleman said that trade unions should deal with the workplace and nothing else. Let us consider four issues—health and safety, wages, better hours and better pensions, and workers' rights. With the exception of wages, every one has been and must be debated in the House. Indeed, some hon. Members used yesterday's pensions debate to focus on workers' rights, workplace pensions, wages and conditions. The House will always be inextricably linked with the rights of ordinary working people.

On health and safety, hon. Members may recall the Samuel commission of 1926. The House had to legislate for miners to work shifts of seven and a quarter hours, because employers were making them work much longer. Even in the 1970s, however, miners were killed at Markham Main colliery. They were not even being paid a penny some of the time, because their terms and conditions made it clear that the walking time and winding time involved in going down the pit belonged to the employer, not the employee.

Health and safety legislation must be passed by the House, and it exists to protect workers who are not protected by trade union rights.

Mr. Robathan: I entirely agree that trade unions should have a role in representing their members on matters such as health and safety, but the hon. Gentleman seemed to defend a position in which dockers could stifle the country and override a democratically elected Government. That is a strange position to take.

David Hamilton: It is not a strange position, and the matter is clear. Employees are entitled to be represented, and the people they elect represent their interests. If the conditions that they work under are so bad that they feel it necessary to go into dispute, that is their right. The hon. Gentleman and some Governments would have that right withdrawn, but this Government would not. Like many Labour Members, I would fight tenaciously against the imposition of any such changes.

I have mentioned better hours, conditions and pensions, but workers' rights are instrumental in establishing how fast the movement can work. The Government still have a long way to go, although they are showing signs that they will consider other necessary changes. The relationship between trade unions and the Government will survive, even though trade union leaders and Ministers come and go, as will politicians, sometimes quicker than they think. The 6 million trade unionists in the movement are what matter. We should never forget that Labour Members at least are here to represent those people's interests outside the workplace, which are as important as their rights in it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I advise hon. Members to disregard the times on the Annunciator, which I understand are normally controlled by radio signals from Rugby. For some reason, those Rugby signals must be offside, so we should go by the times on the other clock.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central): I always assumed that the times were controlled by radio signals from the Deputy Speaker.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) on initiating this important debate. Many issues in our society come down to the basic rights of individuals to be members of trade unions, and to work collectively with their fellow workers.

Before I come to the meat and drink of my speech, I want to say to the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) that his constituency has a rather appropriate name, as it could be pronounced "Blabby". I do not think that it would be out of order for me to say that his speech was contemptible—but that will be a matter of opinion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) referred to yesterday's decision of the European Court of Human Rights. I hope that the Minister will reflect on that judgment in his winding-up speech. The court held that it was an erosion and a breach of the human rights of individual workers for employers to insist on negotiating individually and buying out the right to collective bargaining.

That judgment is important, as it establishes at the highest legal level the legitimacy of collective bargaining as a way to promote the rights of individuals. They are better served not by negotiating on an individual basis, but by operating collectively. I hope that the Minister will suggest what the Government intend to do about that, as legislation is needed if we are to bring our law into shape to match the judgment.

I want to pick up part of the good speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton). It is absolutely legitimate for trade unions and trade unionists to campaign politically. It would be an outrageous abuse of their rights in a free society if that position were eroded. It is right and proper that everything that the trade union movement does that reflects on the needs of its members is translated, where necessary, through collective action that brings matters to the House of Commons, and a legislative conclusion.

Health and safety is a fundamental example of why that has to happen. A Labour Government introduced the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974, which was a pioneering piece of legislation. It established a basis for partnership and the roles of the safety representative and the safety committee. Where it has been put into operation, it has been possible to measure the reduction in accidents and injuries in the workplace as a result of that partnership working. In a company that has both safety representatives and a safety committee, the accident rate is something like half of that in equivalent organisations without such a system.

Partnership works. When trade unions are trusted and are seen as part of the process, not only health and safety but many other areas become manageable. Work-related injury and illness cost the country some £19 billion. We have a huge motivation to make sure that the health and safety partnership works not just well—as it does in many cases—but better, so that we can reduce both the human tragedy and the economic cost.

Other hon. Members want to speak, so I shall curtail my remarks. The Government have introduced a statutory role for union learning representatives. That sensible decision was resisted by the official Opposition, which saw it as a terrible thing. The brutal truth is that unless trade unions are part of the process of upskilling the country, we shall suffer from the malaise of a low-skilled work force. One in five of the British work force have serious problems in that they lack basic educational skills. Previous Conservative Governments deserve a lot of condemnation for the way in which they eroded standards in our schools, and more for the fact that they are not prepared to support the role of the union learning representative in upskilling and building the educational skills base of the work force.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lloyd: If the intervention is very brief.

Mr. Hammond: To be fair, the hon. Gentleman should remind the Chamber that the position of the official Opposition is that we acknowledge the value of union learning representatives where they are appointed by consensus between the employer and the unions. What we doubt is the efficacy of imposing them by legislation.

Mr. Lloyd: Those are weasel words. Opposition Members pretend to use the language of co-operation, but will do everything they can do to prevent it from operating in practice.

The Government still have a lot to do if they are to provide a level playing field for employers and employees. The review of the Employment Relations Act 1999 and the implementation of the draft directive on information and consultation must be meaningful and give real rights to people at work. If they do not, the Government will be failing people who deserve better from us—those who have supported us for many years through the trade union movement. They need our help and it is legitimate for us to give it.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) on having secured this important debate. We have a track record of representing workers in the workplace, particularly in difficult times. Trade unions are like democratically elected Governments—they are the legitimate voice of workers in Britain. If we did not have trade unions, we should be looking for a way of inventing them. I am proud to say, as a member of the Transport and General Workers Union—

Mr. Hammond: Will the hon. Gentleman remind us what percentage of workers in Britain are members of trade unions?

Jim Sheridan: I do not have those figures. [Interruption.] There are about 6.6 million people. I shall cover that point later in my contribution.

I am proud to say, as a member of the TGWU, that no organisation other than the trade union movement would have survived the pernicious attacks on it by the Conservative Government, which are the reason why there are only 6.6 million union members in Britain.

I, too, come from a manufacturing background, and I am proud of it. I was fortunate to work for a company that recognised the benefits of working with a responsible trade union. That company came through difficult times and worked along with the trade union to ensure its long-term security, and I am proud to say that it still exists and is growing.

The benefits of trade unions are collectiveness and, most importantly, unity in strength and numbers. After the pernicious attacks by Conservative Governments, even today there is anecdotal evidence of companies continuing to discourage people from joining a legitimate trade union. Current employment legislation is welcome, but it should be enhanced.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) mentioned the case of Friction Dynamex. That is a disgraceful dispute; what those workers have been put through should be highlighted at every opportunity, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take that on board.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland): Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the situation on many merchant ships that are coming under the red ensign as a result of the tax benefits that the Government have introduced? Workers on merchant ships and ferries work under contracts that exclude the right to join a union. Does he not think it ironic that a Labour Government should give tax breaks to bring in shipping, but not protect workers' rights?

Jim Sheridan: To be honest, I am not aware of that situation, but I am sure that the Minister will consider the question.

I return to the point about employers discouraging employees from joining trade unions. There is anecdotal evidence in my constituency of trade unionists handing out leaflets outside the factory gates, only for the director or supervisor to tell employees, when they go inside the factory gates, that if they want to join a particular union the management will help them fill in the forms—and then give them their jackets on their way out. That is why only 6.6 million people have joined trade unions in Great Britain—they are actively discouraged from joining a trade union because of the fear of being sacked.

The Government have created an environment in which people are happy to join a trade union provided that they do not get the sack for doing so, but it is still important that the Government give some thought to what the trade unions are saying. Trade unions should influence the Government by argument, not through how much money they give the Government, the party or individual Members of Parliament.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I was beginning to think that I was going to miss the opportunity to say what a pleasure it was to participate in the debate. Now that I have that opportunity, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) on securing this important debate. The Official Report record of the debate should be essential reading for every trade unionist in the country, because it puts into context the difference in viewpoint between the Opposition parties and the Labour party.

There is a need for partnership between the trade unions and the Government. I make no apologies for having been a member of the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union, as it then was—it is now Amicus—since 1964. During that time I have been a shop steward, a convenor of a large factory and a full-time union official. I know better than most the need for trade unionism for the people of this country. I was a full-time union official during the dark years of Thatcherism, and I welcome the fact that the Labour Government treat workers with fairness, after the vindictiveness with which Tory Governments treated them. Conservative Members may smirk, but I can give them an example.

I remember a small factory called Craven Tasker Trailers in Cumbernauld, in which the union had many members—I sympathise with the constituents of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) in this regard. Most employees in the plant had worked there for 30 to 35 years. They were affected by the legislation passed by the Tory Government. I do not blame Thatcher, I blame the Tory Government for the legislation, because it was very vindictive towards ordinary people—not the union leaders, as was alleged. It affected the conditions in which ordinary people worked. They often found themselves under pressure to accept a standstill in wages or a deterioration in conditions. They also had to accept, if they were trade union representatives, that they could be targeted by the Government or their employer. That was the tragedy and unfairness of that time.

The employees of that small company decided to go for a wage increase, and were put in a position where they had no alternative but to take strike action. We went through the tortuous process of giving the name of every individual employee, letting the company examine that list and then seeking agreement from the trade union executive for the strike to take place. That is what had to happen. The employees then decided to take strike action. Within two days, every one of them was dismissed—35 years of service down the tube. I was so upset as a union official that I asked to meet the managing director. I met him and his answer was, "They betrayed the company."

The employees were on strike for 12 months. I went to the picket line every day and I remember the despair in their faces. We should think about that when we consider the fairness of the relationship between work forces and the Government. I am delighted with what has been done, and with the progress that this Government have delivered; I have a list of 19 points, but I do not have time to go through them all. However, it is important to recognise what has been done. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian said that there was more to be done to ensure that the people of this country and their conditions of work are protected, and I think that we can do that.

However, I do not believe that any trade union has the right to dictate to Members of Parliament what they should support. Unions should have the right to campaign on their issues, on wages and conditions—but to tell an MP that he or she must support a particular line is the wrong way for a trade union to act, and I deplore it.

There is a need for partnership between the Government and trade unions, and in the workplace. That happens in many workplaces, but there are still bad employers who abuse their work forces. Those work forces need our support and our help. It is essential that we recognise that fact, and that trade unions are given an opportunity to defend their members and the weapons to do so, because they need weapons on occasion.

It is essential for those on the Front Bench to make it clear exactly where the Labour party stands on this issue. We need to go further with trade union legislation, but that should be done on a fair basis, recognising people's need for membership of trade unions and the potential for partnership.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking), not merely on introducing an important subject but on the way in which she did so. I have sat through many debates in this Chamber in which the opening speaker has gone on for 35 or 40 minutes. She said what she had to say in six minutes, which is an example to us all.

There are two debates going on here. One is a practical debate about modern trade unionism and employment rights, which is where we should be concentrating our energy. The other is a separate, parallel debate about the politics of the matter, and what I think is still called the Labour movement. The British structure has been in place for a century, since the break up of the Liberal party in the first part of the 20th century. The unique link between the trade union movement and one political party is very odd. That is not how unions operate in the rest of Europe, where there is a multiplicity of political associations and links with the Church, or no links with any parties at all. It is an odd relationship, which, frankly, is becoming embarrassing and out of date on both sides. I shall leave that to Labour Members to resolve because I want to return to the essentially practical issues relating to modern trade unionism.

The trade union movement has changed out of all recognition during the past 20 years, for two basic reasons: first, as a result of a process of legislative reform, which started under the late Barbara Castle and was carried through by Conservative Governments. As in many other areas, the Conservatives went to excess, but many of the reforms had to happen—as most trade unionists privately acknowledge. Secondly, and probably more important than legislative reform, is the change in the economy. Less than 20 per cent of the labour force is now employed in manufacturing industry and mining, and most people now work in the service sector. There is hardly any manufacturing in my constituency. Everyone works in services, especially information-based services, so trade unions have had to come to terms with a very different environment and make themselves relevant in that environment. The more forward-looking trade unions and the TUC are doing that.

Trade unions now perform three key roles. The first, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons), is the development of the concept of partnership working, initiated in the 1980s by the engineering unions, when they were trying to make sense of conflicts in the car industry and other engineering industries by trying to adopt a more positive approach to productivity improvements. That helped to turn round the car industry. It is the new philosophy on the manufacturing side of the trade union movement, and it is very welcome.

Trade unions are also beginning to realise that their real role is defending individuals in the workplace, because in most companies, even fairly well-managed companies, there will be unfair dismissal, abuse and discrimination. At my surgery last Friday I heard about a typical case, in which the employer at an American-owned factory in the nearby constituency of Brentford and Isleworth disowned its final salary pension scheme. It closed the scheme to existing members and then, when they retired, their entitlements were halved. That basically amounts to stealing, and it is an appalling situation, but the employees were not unionised. They were relying on their trustees, who were ineffective. That is precisely the sort of situation in which a trade union, with proper professional back-up, can help workers.

The third positive advance, which has been led by the TUC, is understanding—this was not understood 20 years ago—that economic stability and a low inflation environment are in the interests of trade unions. We now have lower unemployment than we have had for a generation, partly because we have low and predictable inflation. The trade unions have supported the policies that produced that situation. They have also supported the principle of Britain being part of an open economy within Europe and the rest of the world. That is very different from the attitude of many French or American trade unions, which have led the protest against international trade. In all those respects, the British trade union movement has played a constructive role, although often in very quiet ways.

In certain areas, trade unions have achieved significant advances in the past few years. The most important of those is the introduction of the minimum wage. I admit that I was critical of that concept, having seen how it operates in other countries, such as France, where a high minimum wage is applied rigidly, undoubtedly causing relatively high rates of unemployment, especially among younger workers. Many of us feared that if that system were transplanted to Britain, it would cause considerable damage, but the minimum wage has been introduced in a consensual way, taking into account the economic consequenees, and has been positive. We want the minimum wage to be extended to younger workers, but the way in which it has been introduced is a credit to all the three partners involved.

There has also been a welcome advance in relation to parental leave and recognition of the need for flexibility for families. I welcome that change. As the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) emphasised, the trade unions have been increasingly involved in learning and skills activities, which is also welcome. Evidence shows that trade union officials are now much more actively involved in supporting individuals with grievance procedures. They now have that right, which is an important advance.

In several respects, the Liberal Democrats would like employment rights to be enhanced. The first, which the hon. Gentleman also touched on, is consultation. Many of us were shocked last year by how the Vauxhall redundancies were announced. There was no warning or consultation, and people heard about losing their jobs over the radio. That was unacceptable. Clearly, we have to fashion a British solution, not merely some Europe-imposed general practice. An entitlement to consultation seems an essential employment right, and we strongly support that principle.

Similarly, more can be done to enhance labour rights in connection with work flexibility. That may come through in statutory instruments following the Enterprise Bill, but the principle of workers being entitled to flexibility and being able to pursue through an arbitration procedure cases in which an employer is unreasonable seems a necessary extension of workers' rights.

The old unionism is still around, and it is a problem in two regards. We experienced the first last year—it has now died down—through the action taken in public services, especially on the railways. I do not apportion blame to Stagecoach or the RMT—they were probably both responsible—but the action almost brought the rail system to a halt. The fact that a relatively small group of people can bring the infrastructure of the country to a halt is wrong. I support the principle of legislation to deal with public sector strikes through compulsory arbitration. That would not lean to one side or the other, but would prevent such disruption on a large scale. On that issue, we disagree with some of the more militant trade unions.

My final point relates to the politics of the subject, and to what I said earlier about the trade union movement. A situation in which one political party relies on heavy funding from one interest group is becoming increasingly obsolete, just as it is wrong for a party to rely on big business donations. One of the reasons why the Government pursued business donations was that they did not want to become over-dependent on the trade unions—and they had got themselves into bed with some questionable business people.

That is not in the interests of the Government or the public. We want comprehensive reform of the system of political donations, so that parties are state funded, topped up by small private donations without any vested interests involved. If that system was cleaned up, there would be an end to the acrimonious and unhelpful debate about political influence, and the trade unions could get on better with the job of defending their members, which they are increasingly showing that they can do in a modern economy.

12.8 pm

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I too congratulate the hon. Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) on securing the debate—but I am not entirely sure that her success will have been greeted with such glee in the Treasury, the Department of Trade and Industry and No. 10.

Some of the debate has struck me as taking place in a time warp. The hon. Lady spoke of the Government having the trade union movement at their very core, and the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) regaled us with stories of picket lines. However, it has been an interesting debate. At first glance, there is a temptation for the Opposition to treat the debate as a bit of private grief between the Labour party and the trade unions—a lovers' tiff, as the Labour party tries to face both ways at once, with the Liberal Democrats snapping at its heels, hoping perhaps to pick up some titbits.

The Government have performed a rather cynical balancing act as they have attempted to extract money from both sides, but that has inevitably started to alienate both sides. The trade unions, unsurprisingly, feel that they have substantially funded the Labour party's remarkable electoral success, and they expect a commensurate influence on policy. Business people believe that they have bent over backwards to nurture a relationship with the Government over the past five years, but they have finally realised that there is nothing in it for them. That was illustrated by the Chancellor's lack of consultation with business before the Budget blow on national insurance contributions was announced.

We could treat this matter as a private grief, and I could recite the litany of embarrassments that the Government have suffered recently. My hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) has already referred to the Deputy Prime Minister's problems, and to the RMT's blatant attempts to control the behaviour of Members whose constituency parties are receiving financial support. A few days ago, even the secretary general of the TUC described the Prime Minister as "bloody stupid"—a view that Conservative Members share. Something is afoot when even a moderate TUC secretary general makes such a comment about a Labour Prime Minister.

People who take £9 million of funding from an organisation to fight an election, and win it, should, if they are sensible, expect the organisation to come knocking at their door—and also expect that, whatever they do, it will be hard to satisfy entirely.

Mr. Lloyd: The relationship between the trade union movement and the Labour party has always been crystal clear, because it has always been published. The unions take part in Labour's conference and any money given is recorded. In the context of his example, can the hon. Gentleman tell us what the Conservative Government gave to the foreign shipowners, or to others whose records have never been published, who contributed to the Tory party when it was in government? Does he agree that we should publish those records to answer that question?

Mr. Hammond: I do not think that the fact that the situation is transparent and open makes it right—[Interruption.]. I shall deal with the issue of business contributions in a moment.

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) is incorrect: agreements between constituency parties and trade unions do not have to be declared. That is how the Deputy Prime Minister managed not to declare his links with RMT even while he was Transport Secretary.

Mr. Hammond: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information.

My point is that a party that takes £9 million from an organisation to win an election, which it then wins, should expect the organisation to have demands and to want to influence policy. One can also expect that one demand will lead to another. The Communication Workers Union forced the Government to back down on the threshold value for liberalisation of postal services after a confrontation at the 1999 Labour party conference. Earlier this year, a disenchanted CWU worker wrote to the The Guardian:

> "I object to the claim that Tony Blair has done favours for anyone who makes a large donation . . . Our union, the CWU, has donated more than £1m in the last year and he has done sod all for us."

The Labour party has sought and procured donations from business, but they have come from individuals in business, not organisations; the party has not secured donations from representative business organisations. In scandal after scandal in recent years, we have seen how the Labour Government repay their debts to individual business donors—through specific favours to individual companies or entrepreneurs, such as through exemptions from legislation, clearance of takeovers, public sector contracts, peerages and jobs in public and quasi-public bodies.

Unfortunately, we cannot treat the matter simply as private grief because when the Labour party decides, for whatever reason, to bend to the demands of its trade union paymasters, British business and British working people will pay Labour's election debts. As the support for the Labour party from business and the middle England floating voter erodes, Labour will clearly be driven back into the arms of its traditional supporters in the trade unions.

Jim Sheridan: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address the problem that workers are concerned about in Britain. In the unlikely event of a Tory Government being re-elected, what changes would he make to current employment legislation? Would he change it or would he keep it?

Mr. Hammond: That is an interesting point. If the hon. Gentleman had been a member of the Committee considering the Employment Bill and had listened to what employer and business organisations are saying, he would have a sense that the measures that have been introduced are just about tolerable for business to carry on functioning effectively and competitively with our European neighbours. We have reached the point at which the imposition of further inflexibilities in the labour market will take us down a route that leads to a substantial loss of competitiveness, which will ultimately lead to job losses. That would not do anybody in this country any good.

I want to step back and talk about the two distinct groups that I perceive in the trade union movement. We often talk about the unions, but it seems to me that there are two distinct groups. I am happy to agree with the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd), who said that private sector unions have, for the most part, changed the way in which they operate. They engage constructively with employers in most cases, and play a constructive and important role in the workplace on issues such as education and health and safety. That part of the equation is generally working well. Nowadays, private sector unions seek to create, through pressure in Brussels and Westminster, a legislative and regulatory environment that moves the framework within which they negotiate at workplace level with employers further and further in their favour. That is a legitimate political objective for organised labour and that is the way in which they go about it. The problem, as the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) said, is that that movement is associated with a single political party in this country.

The Employment Relations Act 1999 has barely bedded in. The Employment Bill, which gives further concessions to the trade union agenda, has not even finished its passage through the House, yet the Government are trumpeting their review of workers' rights. We need to know whether that is simply a sham to silence dissent from the Government's trade union supporters, whether the Government are simply stalling for time, or whether their serious intention is to impose further burdens on business that will have long-term damaging effects on the UK economy. Given the Government's position, I was not surprised to hear John Monks saying that the unions were back in business.

I would never suggest that unions do not have a legitimate role to play, and I have had that debate with the hon. Member for Manchester, Central, who is an expert on those matters, during the progress of the Employment Bill. I should also like to state, for the record, that abuse does go on in the workplace. I have said to the hon. Gentleman before that where abuse is taking place we will support measures to deal with it. We are not in the business of defending abuse, but we are in the business of defending British business—and, ultimately, British workers' jobs—against the imposition of further inflexibility that will reduce competitiveness and our opportunity to compete in world markets.

It will be said, and has been said, that many of the measures that have been introduced are simply "catching us up" with the situation in our European competitor countries. Labour practices are quite different in many European countries, and Germany has 4 million people unemployed. The hon. Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton) spoke about miners and dockers, but where are those jobs now? They have gone, because they were priced out of the market by uncompetitive practices and labour inflexibility.

Mr. Tynan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: No I will not, because I only have one minute left and I want to give the Minister plenty of time.

By contrast, the public sector unions have a different agenda, of attempting direct control of Government policy. Having got the Government elected in 2001, while keeping very quiet during the election campaign, they immediately popped up demanding what was, effectively, a veto over Government policy. I do not know which is more serious, the threat to British business and jobs from the relentless pressure to pursue the unions' costly agenda of employment protection legislation, or the threat to British democracy posed by their demands to have a veto over the policy of an elected democratic Government. What is certainly true beyond doubt is that as the Government's honeymoon with the middle England floating voter and with the business community comes to an end, they will be driven increasingly back into the arms of their traditional paymasters in the trades unions.

I shall finish with a short quotation that I heard on Radio 4 last week. Mr. Crow of the RMT said of the Labour party:

> "We set it up; we paid for it."

The trade union movement continues to pay for the Labour party. It paid for the election victory in 2001, and now British business, consumers, public service users—and, ultimately, workers—will pay Labour's election debts.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): Does that speech not make you feel nostalgic, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) and pay tribute to her work in the public sector, which underpins so much of the quality of life that we enjoy in this country. She set a high standard with her contribution, which my hon. Friends followed. They spoke with deep knowledge, experience and conviction on this important issue. I am a lifelong trade unionist and a member of the T and G and of Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, and I welcome the many constructive comments made by my hon. Friends and other hon. Members.

The job of Government is to govern in the interests of the whole country, and to build a strong, stable economy and inclusive society that spreads prosperity and provides opportunities for all. Partnerships are vital to such work, in helping to make policy, deliver change and understand needs. By working together, we have proved that we can achieve more than we ever could have achieved by operating in isolation. By sharing work, ideas, responsibility, burdens and benefits, we can resolve difficulties and disagreements and strengthen and broaden relationships.

The Government need good, effective and mature partnerships. We must work effectively with all our stakeholders if we are to work effectively for them. The fruits of co-operation are the 1.5 million jobs that have been created since 1997. The casualties of conflict were the 3 million-plus people unemployed in the 1980s. As my hon. Friend pointed out in her opening remarks, partnerships are emphatically not about favours to friends or to any of the stakeholders, but about fairness; otherwise, partnerships will not work.

Our vision at the Department of Trade and Industry is prosperity for all through successful business, world-class science and innovation and labour markets that promote fairness and flexibility. Every month, I visit world-class UK firms. Last week I was at the Institution of Mechanical Engineers awards presentation. I gave a keynote speech and met the winners of the manufacturing excellence awards for 2002. We work in partnership with business, employees and consumers to make the UK the most prosperous place in the world.

We already have the fastest growing economy of the G8 countries. To achieve our economic prosperity, we must drive up UK productivity and competitiveness and close the gap with our international competitors. Only in that way can we create more of the high-wage, high-skill, value-added jobs that we want. We know that that is a big task, because we know that our competitors are not standing still.

There are ever more challenges in the world in which we work. It is changing faster and more, with new technologies, ways of working, competitors and ideas. I saw new exciting ideas at Elvingston science centre in East Lothian, which I visited with my hon. Friend a short time ago. It is a showcase science park for micro businesses.

If we are to succeed in our aim of improving prosperity for all, we must face the challenge in partnership with business, workers, trade unions, investors, educators and many others. In that way, the partnerships can benefit all of us. They all have a crucial role in raising productivity and competitiveness individually and collectively. As a Department, we must focus on areas where we can make the greatest difference.

My hon. Friend spoke of her concern about a two-tier work force, and I am informed that if staff must transfer, the national health service private finance initiative schemes will not be approved unless the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 are fully applied and staff are offered broadly comparable pension terms, which must be approved and certified by the Government Actuary's Department. The Department of Health is involved in discussions about the possible wider effects of contracting out, and a work programme to take that forward has been agreed by the Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) and other colleagues referred to the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights. The initial reading of the judgment suggests that it does little direct damage to the law on union recognition, but it strongly suggests that the law providing protection against detriment on grounds of trade union membership needs to be tightened. The Secretary of State will shortly launch a review of the Employment Relations Act 1999, which will allow us to consult on the appropriate response to that judgment.

We the DTI realise that we must ensure that there is fairness in the workplace. Trade unions, business and other stakeholders realise that we must raise our game. We must work harder at the key relationships, including those with trade unions, to deliver the increased productivity and competitiveness to which I referred earlier. That does not mean handing the DTI over to business interests. It means ensuring that everyone who can make a positive contribution is given the chance to do so.

Improvements in productivity and competitiveness are not an arid, mechanical exercise to raise industrial efficiency. We know that people's lives are improved by providing social and economic opportunities. For the Labour Government, the labour market is the point where our two overriding ambitions meet most starkly: our ambition for a dynamic, successful economy and our quest—indeed, our passion—for social justice.

The Government are often accused of being obsessed with the work ethic. As a Scot, I make no apology for that. The Labour party was created, with no small help from the trade union movement, to lift people out of poverty through the provision of work. I have seen at first hand in my constituency, as have other hon. Members, how unemployment destroys people's health, undermines their families and destroys community cohesion. I have no doubt that jobs are vital to social inclusion and social justice.

When we came into government, we were clear about our policy towards the unions. It was not to turn the clock back to the 1970s. We knew, and I believe that most unions knew, that some of the reforms of the 1980s were necessary. The unions had to modernise and reform to meet the challenges of a changing economic environment, just as individuals in business had to change. Some of the key reforms—for example, pre-strike ballots and the outlawing of secondary action—were supported in the trade union movement, and some unions had the option of a pre-strike ballot written into their rule books before legislation was introduced. However, we all know about aspects of the Conservatives' reforms that were vindictive and counter-productive. Some of my hon. Friends have spoken with deep and personal knowledge about them.

The Conservatives sought to marginalise the unions and to deny legitimate workplace representation. This Government recognise that unions have a valuable role to play in the economy and in society. That is why this Government have done more in five years to protect workers' rights through legislation than any other Government. We restored the right to join a trade union at GCHQ within 13 days of coming to office. We introduced statutory procedures enabling unions to obtain recognition in organisations with more than 20 employees. With measures such as our landmark minimum wage, which has helped 1.5 million people and is now supported by all parties, the automatic entitlement to four weeks' paid leave, and help for the 400,000 part-time workers who now directly benefit, we have shown that our commitment is to working people—

Mr. Eric Illsley (in the Chair): Order. We must now move to the next debate.

Cancer

12.30 pm

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): As a former Chairman of the Select Committee on Health—I chaired it for five years, during which time we undertook an inquiry into breast cancer services—and as a current chairman of the all-party group on breast cancer, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak about the important subject of cancer prevention. It is an issue that is often neglected, and remains in the shadow of treatment and care for cancer patients. Unfortunately even the medical profession does not always give it much thought, yet it is probably the factor that could have the largest impact on the lives of the British public if more people knew how to reduce their risk of developing cancer.

People are increasingly concerned about cancer, taking a fatalistic "que sera sera" attitude. Recent press discussion about genetic links' making cancer more likely in some families than in others has added to the fear surrounding the disease. In fact, only about 2 per cent. of cancers have any genetic link. It is more likely that common lifestyles and diets in families lead to higher incidences in some families than in others.

Although it is true that cancer is the biggest cause of death in the world, with more than 10 million new cases and 6 million deaths every year, it is not as out of control as we think. According to the World Cancer Research Fund, up to 40 per cent. of cancers are preventable through diet and lifestyle alone, and the figure rises to 70 per cent. if giving up smoking is included. In global terms, that means that appropriate diets could prevent more than 4 million cases of cancer each year. Keeping alcoholic intake within the recommended limits would prevent up to 20 per cent. of cases of cancer of the aerodigestive tract, colon, rectum and breast. So this is by no means a disease to which we must resign ourselves, although currently many people do not have an opportunity to reduce their risk because they have no access to the relevant information.

An expert report called "Food, Nutrition and the Prevention of Cancer: a global perspective" reviewed more than 4,500 leading research studies from around the world in the field of diet, nutrition and cancer. It was commissioned by the World Cancer Research Fund to provide up-to-date, reliable advice for individuals on how to make the changes that can protect them from cancer. The report is currently being updated, and is an ideal source of information for policy makers and opinion formers. Unfortunately there is a surplus of inaccurate information all around us, from a variety of ill-informed sources, about healthy eating and eating for health. The public feel inundated with information but are unaware of the health benefits of eating a diet rich in vegetables and fruits and low in fat and salt.

Here is an example of good promotional practice. Cancer Research UK has teamed up with Tesco, the supermarket chain, whose headquarters are in my constituency, to promote the "five a day" campaign to the chain's 16 million customers. By actively promoting the "five a day" message, we can encourage people to improve their diet and protect the long-term health of their families. The Government and other organisations are also involved in major "five a day" initiatives.

However, how often do we see people who have given up smoking because they are afraid that they may develop cancer, but who still pile salt on their food and eat a diet high in red meat and fat or low in fresh vegetables and fruit?

Prevention is the only sensible approach to cancer. It benefits not only individuals but families, communities and national economies. The nation's health needs to improve and we can improve only if everyone, including the Government, co-operates to broadcast information such as that in the expert report to as wide an audience as possible.

As a result of the report's conclusions, the World Cancer Research Fund drew up a set of recommendations for cancer prevention that are straightforward to understand and are used by people who are concerned to reduce their risk of cancer. Many health professionals also find the recommendations an invaluable guide for advising patients on cancer prevention.

Nurses' close relationship with communities and patients means that they are ideally placed to promote healthy living. Their work ranges from that of the school nurse who gives advice on healthy eating to that of the public health nurse who explains to men in pubs about testicular cancer. Nurses work with minority groups to raise awareness of specific cancers and practice nurses play an essential role in early detection by screening and monitoring.

The trouble is that although the World Cancer Research Fund runs an extensive education and communications programme, it cannot possibly provide information to the whole population. It needs Government support in the cancer prevention arena to make progress. Its recommendations are:

> "Choose predominantly plant-based diets rich in a variety of vegetables and fruits, pulses and minimally processed, starchy staple foods.
> Avoid being underweight or overweight and limit weight gain during adulthood to less than 5 kg (11 pounds).
> If occupational activity is low or moderate, take an hour's brisk walk or similar exercise daily, and also exercise vigorously for a total of at least one hour in a week.
> Eat 400-800 grams (15-30 ounces) or five or more portions a day of a variety of vegetables and fruits, all year round.
> Eat 600-800 grams (20-30 ounces) or seven or more portions a day of a variety of cereals, pulses, roots, tubers and plantains. Choose minimally processed foods and limit the amount of refined sugar you eat or drink.
> Alcohol consumption is not recommended. If consumed at all, limit alcoholic drinks to less than two drinks a day for men and one for women.
> If eaten at all, limit intake of red meat to less than 80 grams (3 ounces) daily. It is preferable to choose fish, poultry or meat from non-domesticated animals in place of red meat.
> Limit consumption of fatty foods, particularly those of animal origin. Choose modest amounts of appropriate vegetable oils.
> Limit consumption of salted foods and use of cooking and table salt. Use herbs and spices to season foods.
> Do not eat food which, as a result of prolonged storage at ambient temperatures, is liable to contamination with mycotoxins.
> Use refrigeration and other appropriate methods to preserve perishable food.
> When levels of additives, contaminants and other residues are properly regulated, their presence in food and drink is not known to be harmful. However, unregulated or improper use can be a health hazard, and this applies particularly in economically developing countries.
> Do not eat charred food. For meat and fish eaters, avoid burning of meat juices. Consume the following only occasionally: meat and fish grilled in direct flame, cured and smoked meats."

For those who follow the recommendations, dietary supplements are probably unnecessary and possibly unhelpful for reducing cancer risk. The recommendations are consistent with guidelines for preventing other major diseases such as heart disease and strokes, and if followed will provide a healthy diet and lifestyle that will not just prevent cancer, but make people feel much better.

There is a consistent pattern showing that diets high in fruit and vegetables decrease the risk of many cancers. There is also conclusive evidence showing a link between being being overweight and higher cancer risk. In particular kidney, endometrium, colon, prostate, gall bladder, and postmenopausal breast cancers are all linked to being overweight. More than 90 per cent. of cancers have a hormonal link, and levels of hormones are all affected by overeating and being overweight. Changes in diet could prevent up to half of all cases of breast cancer and three out of four cases of stomach cancer.

The European prospective investigation into cancer and nutrition is the largest study of diet and health ever undertaken and is aimed at providing reliable information on dietary factors and cancer risk. Researchers in 10 European countries have together recruited a total of half a million men and women to the study. Cancer Research UK is providing core support for the UK arm of EPIC, which is being co-ordinated by two centres, located in Oxford and Cambridge.

In conclusion, my questions to the Minister are simple and straightforward. What are the Government's intentions with regard to cancer prevention education? Do the Government agree that cancer prevention is an important area to promote, and how do they plan to do that? How do the Government plan to make prevention of cancer a more integrated part of health service policy? I look forward to the Minister's reply.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Hazel Blears): I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) for raising the extremely important issue of cancer prevention, and for focusing on the links between a healthy, nutritious diet and the cancers that she mentioned.

The area is very important and does not always receive the attention that it should, but I have a sense that it is becoming increasingly important and increasingly well known amongst the general public. We have an opportunity today to put some of those issues on the record and raise them even higher in the general consciousness.

As the hon. Lady said, cancer is clearly a major cause of mortality and morbidity in England. Every year, 200,000 people are diagnosed with cancer and 130,000 of those people lose their life to the disease. It is a major issue for us in this country, as it is internationally and globally. More than half of the deaths occur to people under the age of 75, so we are not just talking about elderly people approaching the end of their life. This is clearly an issue for many in the prime of life.

There are also very wide inequalities in who gets cancer. People from deprived and less affluent backgrounds are more likely to get some types of cancer, and are more likely to die from them once they have been diagnosed. It is a very important issue for all of us. Since 1997, the Government have pledged to cut the death rate from cancer in people under 75 by at least a fifth by 2010. That is a very challenging target for us to meet. For all the families concerned, it is an incredibly important priority. In particular, we are aiming to improve the health of the worst-off, because they are more likely to suffer.

In the NHS cancer plan, we set out a comprehensive strategy to bring together prevention, screening, diagnosis and treatment, so that the whole service would be outlined within the plan. We shall try to set standards for each of those elements, because all parts of the process are equally important. It is pointless to have the most wonderful treatment in the world if we do not also focus on prevention and on getting to the causes of cancer, as the hon. Lady so ably outlined.

Preventing cancer is a key component of our approach to meeting the target for reductions. We recognise that unless we get prevention right we shall not reach the targets that we have set. Engaging the public and the professionals is absolutely key. I strongly feel that, in addition to getting the message across and dealing with health promotion, we must engage people in wanting to change their eating habits, in stopping smoking and in changing their whole lifestyle. Evidence has shown that it is not enough for Ministers to issue edicts and good advice. We need to engage people in realising why they need to change, and what they can achieve for themselves, so that they have a sense of being in control and taking responsibility for their health.

The hon. Lady rightly raised the role of smoking in causing cancer. That is pretty widely understood now. Smoking causes about a third of cancer deaths, and half of all lifelong smokers will die from their habit. Those are astounding figures. We have set tough targets on tackling smoking, and we have put a particular emphasis on trying to reduce smoking among the less affluent groups, and particularly among manual workers. Smoking has, in recent years, been more prevalent among such people than among professional groups, who have reduced smoking to a greater extent.

We have backed up the targets with pretty impressive investment. It is acknowledged in this country that we are world leaders in helping people to give up smoking. We do so through clinics, helplines, and one-to-one counselling sessions, which are incredibly popular across the country. Research shows that some 80 per cent. of smokers want to give up; only a small proportion of people want to continue. We therefore have a real responsibility to help people to give up.

We have put £46 million into public education about smoking to try to keep the message in the public consciousness. We also introduced a Bill to ban tobacco advertising, which is making its way through the House and the other place. The Bill will make good our manifesto commitment to ban tobacco advertising. Our action on tobacco is bringing about results. Between April and December last year, smoker services helped nearly 80,000 people give up smoking. That is a pretty impressive figure. Those people were followed up four weeks after they quit, and they were still not smoking then. Sometimes people relapse, and it is important that we give them a second, third and fourth chance to give up smoking, as that seems to be working.

The hon. Lady focused on the less-known relationship between cancer and diet. The link between cancer and smoking is now pretty well established in the public consciousness; another task is to get the link between cancer and diet equally well known in the wider community. There is good evidence to show that dietary factors account for about a quarter of all deaths from cancer. Dietary changes could prevent up to a third of cancers from occurring. Increasing consumption of fruit and vegetables is the most effective prevention strategy for cancer after reducing smoking. People who do not regularly eat fruit and vegetables are at greater risk of several common cancers, including colorectal and stomach cancers, as the hon. Lady said.

Eating at least five portions of fruit and vegetables a day could lead to reductions of up to 20 per cent. in deaths from chronic diseases, including heart disease and strokes as well as cancer. That is good news all the way. If we can get people to have a much better diet, not only will we strike at cancer, but we will make big inroads into heart disease and strokes. There are also less tangible benefits, including the fact that people will feel better in themselves. We need to get that message across.

Consumption of fruit and vegetables in the United Kingdom is pretty low. It is among the lowest in Europe. Although we recommend that people eat five portions of fresh fruit and vegetables a day, average consumption is just three portions a day for adults and two for children. We therefore have a long way to go. One in five children—20 per cent.—eat no fruit at all in an average week. That is a pretty damning statistic, but we are doing something about it, and I am optimistic for the future.

As in the case of smoking, there are wide class differences in people's access to fresh fruit and vegetables. Better-off professional groups eat about 50 per cent. more fresh fruit and vegetables than those in unskilled social groups. A big inequality issue is involved in this case, too, but we are making progress.

We have set up the "five a day" programme to improve access to and consumption of fruit and vegetables. The programme has several different strands. Like the hon. Lady, I was recently in a supermarket and was pleased to see that supermarkets are beginning to market their goods in relation to "five a day", trying to connect fresh fruit with processed foods and trying to give the idea that people can make a healthier meal than they have in the past. Encouraging manufacturers to be imaginative in making the programme attractive to people is important. Simply giving worthy advice will not be effective, but it is possible to affect people's shopping habits.

The new opportunities fund has made available £10 million to build on the success of the pilots that we launched in disadvantaged communities. Primary care trusts have introduced 66 new programmes in local neighbourhoods to try to make it easier for people who live in poorer areas to access fresh fruit and vegetables.

At one pilot site, in Sandwell, it was revealed that few shops in the area sold fruit and vegetables. A home delivery service was therefore set up. It attracted 200 regular customers and within about seven months average monthly household spending on fruit and vegetables more than doubled, to more than £10 a month. There was an increase in average daily consumption for everyone, from one and a half portions to three portions. That delivery service worked. People wanted to eat fresh fruit and veg, but had no shops in their local neighbourhood, and if they did not have a car, found it difficult to travel. We shall build on such pilots as we roll out the new opportunities fund resources.

We are also trying to introduce a good communications programme to spread the message and promote health. We have a "five a day" logo, which people can easily recognise when out shopping and making choices.

The big push is the free fruit in schools scheme. As I said, one in five children eat no fruit in a week, which is why we decided to concentrate on that. We started with pilots and are achieving incredibly good results. Teachers have said that the children talk about the fruit and look forward to it. There was some scepticism at first about whether children would want to eat fruit, but more than 80 per cent. are taking it up and enjoying it.

The scheme has challenged misconceptions about the way in which children view fruit. Given the opportunity, in an attractive setting, with good quality fruit, they want to take part. In virtually all the schools, teachers have welcomed the scheme as supporting their teaching and learning materials. Concerns were expressed about whether it would be an extra administrative burden on teachers, but teachers have welcomed it and incorporated it into much of their health education for children.

The national school fruit scheme is being expanded on a region-by-region basis. It has £42 million from the new opportunities fund. In the current school term, the entire west midlands region is coming on line, which will mean that about 250,000 children in almost 2,000 schools will have free fruit. From the autumn, the next regional push will be in London.

In a new innovation, we are testing the inclusion of vegetables in the scheme. From this week, 7,000 children in Sheffield and Merseyside will eat carrots or tomatoes—little cherry tomatoes, I believe, which are quite attractive—one day a week. If that goes down well, we shall consider whether vegetables can be introduced more widely. There is a widespread conception that children do not like vegetables, but if they are well presented and easy to eat, we have a real chance to change attitudes in the longer term.

The direct support of providing fruit is backed up with curriculum and teaching materials designed to encourage lifelong habits of eating fruit and vegetables in young children. It is not a one-off or just something that they do at school; they take it home with them and, I hope, influence the wider family.

The national healthy school scheme is a big programme. It is aimed at young people, in particular. It emphasises the need to consider a healthy lifestyle as a whole—not only diet, but smoking and the other issues raised by the hon. Lady, such as alcohol consumption. It is important to get across to adults the message about safe levels of alcohol consumption, too.

Regular physical activity is a key issue. It can reduce the risk of certain cancers, particularly colon cancer. We have recently announced that, with Sport England and the Countryside Agency, we shall be setting up nine physical activity community pilot schemes—one in each region—to test innovative ways to involve people in sport and active recreation, so that they can benefit from physical activity. One pilot scheme will focus on free swimming for young people. I am looking forward to when the bids come in and if hon. Members have imaginative ideas for their regions, I encourage them to ensure that they are submitted. Obesity can contribute to postmenopausal breast cancer, as the hon. Lady said, and endometrial cancer. A low-fat and low-energy diet with plenty of fruit and vegetables can lower the risk of such cancers and, together with physical activity, can make a major impact on obesity.

The hon. Lady mentioned alcohol. Its misuse is thought to be a major cause of about 3 per cent. of all cancers, especially cancer of the mouth, the larynx and the oesophagus. As the hon. Lady knows, our alcohol strategy is on track and it will be implemented by 2004. The cancer plan has brought our work together. It provided a commitment to ensure that we considered skin cancer, too, because that is all too common in the United Kingdom. Each year, there are 40,000 cases of skin cancer and about 2,500 people die from malignant melanomas. We must get the right message across to the community. Prevention is central to our strategy, in respect of not only cancer, but coronary heart disease and strokes—all those avoidable deaths, which are such a tragedy for the families involved.

It is difficult to persuade people to change the way that they live. We are all creatures of habit and, when we get into bad habits, it is difficult to get out of them. The public are well educated and they ask us for information. We must supply it. We must ensure that patients and young people—indeed, the whole community—feel that they are partners in their own care and share responsibility for it. They can make a difference to their health. That will have huge spin-offs; it will not only have a direct effect on diseases, but give people a sense of ownership of their own health condition. If people take control, that will provide health benefits. Such an agenda is becoming increasingly important to us all.

I encourage hon. Members to convey strong messages to their communities. We should take every opportunity to carry out health promotion work on public platforms and work with partners, in supermarkets, in manufacturing, or when we visit schools and talk to young people. The average daily consumption of fruit and vegetables in Greece is nine portions a day, yet our average is three portions for adults and two for children. The task before us is considerable. If the standard of our diet can reach some of the better standards of European countries, perhaps we shall experience their sunshine and that might do us some good, too. People in this country will benefit enormously from improving their diet. The Government are determined to do everything that we can to invest in such areas, and in exhortation and persuasion. I hope that it will make a significant difference in cancer cases and the whole range of avoidable diseases.

Mr. Eric Illsley (in the Chair): Before commencing the next debate, I should like to point out that the annunciators have broken down. Hon. Members should not rely on them for timings. The digital clock on the wall is still working.

Traffic Calming

John Mann (Bassetlaw): Time may have stopped here, but the debate about road humps is only just beginning to gather pace. I note from Hansard that in the past 10 years there has been virtually no debate on the issue in the House of Commons or the other place. Road humps have spread like a plague across the estates and mining villages of Britain, and I assure the Minister that residents throughout the country are increasingly up in arms about that.

I tabled a parliamentary question yesterday and was referred to the "Road Safety Compendium" on the internet and in the Library. I am extremely familiar with every document in that compendium in relation to road humps—I have a copy of each document and have read and analysed them all. One interesting factor is how little research has been done on the issue over the years, in this country or abroad.

I wish to make it clear that I do not oppose traffic calming or the reduction of speeds—far from it. I have campaigned vigorously in my constituency for the introduction of speed cameras on the A361, for example, where, sadly, a significant number of people have died in car crashes. One irony is that the county council that introduced road humps in my area and other parts of Nottinghamshire is the one that refuses to bring in speed cameras because it does not believe in their effectiveness or that the case for them has been proven. I hope that the Government will make it impossible for local authorities to opt out. When the local community and the police want speed cameras, they should have them on death roads such as the A631. However, that is not the purpose of this debate.

The compendium to which I referred makes great play throughout of the requirement for consultation on the effectiveness of any traffic-calming method. I congratulate the Minister and the Government on their home zones initiative, which takes the concept of consultation far further by involving the community in the design of road safety. It is noticeable that home zones are both popular and effective and I would welcome them in my area. Sadly, that is not what we have.

I did a poll of the residents of Manton village and 1,836 households responded. Of those, 97.7 per cent. were in favour of the removal of the road humps and 1.8 per cent. were against. Such majorities are unheard of these days, even in North Korea or Cuba. The view of the local people is clear and goes beyond the advice given to me by officials in the Department for Transport, who tell me that they would normally expect approximately a third of the population to be hostile to traffic calming. In my constituency, in essence, three thirds are opposed.

Road humps are not only a local problem. On 30 April, The Times reported on the front page that the social exclusion unit was going to introduce road humps specifically on council estates throughout Britain. Following that report, I invited the social exclusion unit to my constituency, and its members were in the Manton estate on Friday. They witnessed the problem. One hundred and twenty different sets of road humps were ~~put into one~~ mining village in 1995.

I have analysed the statistics on accidents, which show only that statistics can be used in many ways. More than a quarter of accidents happened not in the village but on the main road, which does not surprise me. I especially like to see road safety on main roads. More than a quarter of the accidents happened on one main road, not inside the village, but the statistics were used as the rationale for introducing road humps.

Sleeping policemen were used. The Royal Automobile Club wrote to me this morning and it is interesting that it does not differentiate between sleeping policemen and cushion humps, but I shall for the purpose of this debate because there is a crucial difference. People in Manton do not demand sleeping policemen everywhere, but they are comfortable enough with them. On one road with sleeping policemen, the number of accidents reduced from seven to one. That is the most effective reduction on any street in the entire village.

I oppose speed cushions rather than other forms of road hump. They were developed in Germany and introduced in 1992. They were meant to assist the emergency services while reducing vehicle speeds. In other words, they are especially designed to allow emergency service vehicles to pass down main roads quickly. Transport advisory leaflets Nos. 498 and 198 specifically relate to the fact that such vehicles can straddle the humps.

Let me outline my objections, the first of which is discomfort. In mining villages such as Manton, which has been plagued by road humps, a disproportionate number of people have back complaints because people who have worked down the pit are more likely to have a back complaint. The irony in Manton is that the pensioner bungalows are at the top end of the estate, and pensioners who do not drive and must use the bus are those who are most vigorous in leading the campaign against speed humps, rather than motorists. The question of discomfort is not to be taken lightly, especially in mining villages and estates throughout the country.

I have raised my second objection with the county council. Why do these humps get stuck in mining villages and estates? I do not find them in private housing estates in my area, which are the wealthier estates. My objection is precisely to the attempt to dump more of them in working-class areas, which the social exclusion unit allegedly—according to The Times—attempted to pursue. That exacerbates local opposition.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

John Mann: May I make further progress?

My third objection relates to cars' ability to straddle speed humps. Not only emergency service vehicles straddle them; cars also do. Cars go to the centre of the road or drive around the humps. Bollards must be put on pavements and cyclists cannot get through. The plague on estates today is motor cycles. What do motor cycles do? They go through the middle of cushion humps or use them as take-off ramps. The key point is that the humps do not work.

The speed humps are not intended to be sited at pedestrian crossing points. However, their built-in design features mean that the most vulnerable pedestrians use them as crossing points because they often create a central reservation. Consequently, pensioners and young children use them as a halfway point when crossing the road. People not only go against the Government's advice to cross at the humps, but are attracted to crossing there. Indeed, the question whether pensioners could sue if they trip over the humps might be more important as they start to take action against the authorities that put the humps in.

All the guidance fails to incorporate the fact that there are fewer people with garages on these estates. Therefore, there is more on-street parking, but the guidance makes virtually no reference to that. Officials visit the Manton estate to make their reports on vehicle speed during the day when no cars are parked on the streets. They should see the streets in the evening when they are packed full of cars. Motorists cannot take the humps as they are meant to because of parked cars throughout the estate. That is a fundamental design flaw of the speed cushions. Owing to the guidelines, more speed cushions are required than other forms of traffic calming, such as chicanes or sleeping policemen.

I mentioned motor cycles because drivers of stolen vehicles are not keen to slow down for speed humps. Indeed, if such obstacles are in the way, they add to excitement, which has been a particular problem. The damage that the humps cause to cars is not high in terms of road safety considerations, but I tell hon. Members that many of the people who live on these estates cannot afford to repair broken exhausts, but they get two or three of them because they have to cross those humps. The speed at which they cross the humps does not alter the risk of their exhausts breaking. That is my contention—and that of many local people. Indeed, some people suggest that cars are more likely to be damaged if they go over them at slow speeds—for example, 10 mph. That is another design flaw. No research has been done on that, but it should be done.

My next objection is based on empirical evidence. It is more comfortable to drive over these cushion humps at a higher speed. I demonstrated that—although I did not drive faster than 30 mph, because I am an elected politician. I drove over the humps at 10, 15, 20 and 30 mph with people from the social exclusion unit. They may reach their own conclusions, but they, like me, were able to make comparisons, and it is more uncomfortable to drive over those humps at 15 than at 20 mph, and at 20 than at 30 mph: and yet they are meant to reduce speed. On Manton, there is no evidence that the speedsters slow down. It is the pensioners and other safer drivers who reduce their speed and get maximum discomfort, but they were going slowly in the first place.

I shall now discuss noise and emissions. Those are not major considerations, but the stop-go of traffic that is caused by the humps leads to people objecting to the noise, and to emissions, which is an important factor when we bear in mind the Kyoto emission targets. People ask, "Why should we have to put up with all this, when the wealthier private estates do not have any cushion humps?" Such factors reinforce local public opinion.

The humps were designed for the emergency services. In my area, those services—such as the ambulance service—submitted letters objecting to the scheme because it slows down emergency vehicles; it makes them travel at an average speed of about 15 mph. There are 17 road humps on the journey from the top of the estate to the bottom, where the pensioners are, and there are 17 of them on the journey back. That adds about eight and a half minutes to the journey time of emergency service vehicles. Some of my constituents are seriously affected by that—such as a woman with a broken back who has to go over those 17 road humps to get to hospital. In the light of such situations, it is hard for the authorities to win their case on this particular type of traffic-calming scheme.

Not only the ambulance service is hostile to that scheme. In Nottinghamshire, we have the absurdity that the wheel axis of the fire engines is too small for them to be able to straddle these road humps, so that, in our authority, the humps fail to do what they are designed to do. Therefore, the fire service is also delayed—and, consequently, it also objects. The police are hostile too, because of the effect of the humps on their response times.

Having driven the people from the social exclusion unit over 500 humps in a car, I thought I had better make sure that they fully appreciated the situation, so I took them on a bus. Therefore, they enjoyed the pleasures of travelling on the bus routes of Manton. It is not for me to speak on their behalf about whether they were convinced of my case, but they have a full picture of how uncomfortable it is to sit on the back seat of a Stagecoach Mini-hopper as it goes over the humps on that estate. Local people who have to use the buses because they do not have cars are particularly angry.

The people from the social exclusion unit also witnessed the beautiful irony that the buses could not pass along all the roads because cars park next to the road humps and use them as a safety protector, and because of the bollards that have been put up to stop people driving around them. Bus drivers have to knock on doors to ask the owners of cars to move them so that the buses can get through. That is not funny for someone who is driving an ambulance to an emergency.

The final indignity is the one that has got people going the most. There are 20 road humps on the journey from St. Paul's church to the cemetery in Worksop. I imagine that the person who is being carried in the hearse is no longer able to complain about that, but the families in the cortege also have to cross those humps. Some funeral directors are now refusing to allow their limousines to take people from Manton, because the vehicles suffer the same kind of damage that the ambulance and fire services have reported to me that their vehicles suffer. That makes the funeral directors the most hostile people to this scheme.

There are alternatives. I have proposed a 20 mph zone, I should like to see the use of sleeping policemen where necessary and I should be happy with chicanes, as used in Manchester and recommended in the United States by the emergency services. Crucially, I should like to see consultation on and expansion of the home zone concept, which is currently only an option for local authorities.

My recommendations are that 20 mph zones must be more easily available and that school governors should have the power to incorporate them into their school travel plans. That would be a major breakthrough. School travel plans are currently voluntary. Let us make them compulsory so that road safety is enforced on schools, not optional. It is often in schools on estates that school governors—some of whom might not be in place—have not had the time or the inclination to bring in school travel plans, unlike in more middle-class schools. Let us make those compulsory.

Let us have home zones as the recommended form of traffic calming. Let us have the powers of the emergency services strengthened in any consultation. Let us make funeral directors statutory consultees. Let us have the question of on-street parking re-examined and its impact reassessed in the departmental advice notes. That is a fundamental flaw in the current position. Finally, I suggest that the notorious and hated cushion hump be banned forthwith from every council estate and every mining village in Britain. That is what the people want, and if we have the people on our side, road safety will go forward.

1.16 pm

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) rose—

Mr. Eric Illsley (in the Chair): Order. I can only call the hon. Gentleman if he has obtained the permission of the initiator of the debate.

Mr. Steen: Of course I have done that. It would be wrong of me to stand up without the normal courtesies. I am most grateful to you, Mr. Illsley, and to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann). I thought that he put his case brilliantly and I am delighted that he secured the debate. I support everything that he said, and have just one or two points to add.

My personal life is bedevilled by road humps, bumps, rumble strips, raised ribs in the road and signs in south Devon that say it is 300 yd before the 30 mph speed limit, then 200 yd before the 30 mph speed limit and then 100 yd before the 30 mph speed limit. Speed restrictions are increasingly encroaching into the countryside. There are mini-roundabouts, maxi-roundabouts, road widening schemes and road narrowing schemes. You name it, Devon has it.

There are different types of hump, different sizes, different shapes, different angles, different widths and different elevations. Some are as steep as Everest, some deceptively slow in their angle. Cars can keel over like a boat in a force 8 gale, and being in a maritime constituency, one constantly thinks one is in a boat rather than a car when one hits traffic bumps.

There is an enormous cost to the council tax payer. Each hump or bump costs about £1,000—money that could be spent on social services. Instead of having hot meals on wheels, elderly people now have deep-frozen meals sent to them on one day of the month, which they have to store and go on eating for the whole month, to save money. What is that money being spent on? Traffic humps at £1,000 a time. I am totally opposed to the traffic hump. It is destructive to the vehicle, noisy for people living nearby and of no consequence in stopping traffic. The situation is like that of King Canute. We cannot hold back the traffic by putting in traffic humps or bumps.

I shall briefly mention Totnes, the central town in my constituency. Quite simply, our planners in Devon have too much money and too much time. They spend their time devising new planning schemes to slow down or reverse the traffic. At the moment, the traffic goes up Fore street, as it has for about 300 years. Now there is a plan to turn the traffic and have it going down the street with rumble strips, and little flower-beds in the middle of the main road. The planners want there to be various places for cars to park. They want to reverse traffic flows and hold exhibitions to explain matters to everyone. Very simply, market towns do not need traffic bumps. They need a hopper bus that goes round and round the town every five minutes and a big field to park cars in. Instead, there is an attempt to spend more and more public money on slowing down the traffic.

As the Minister comes from Devon, he will know that in Devon the planners are doing everything that they can to slow down traffic so that one day they will create one huge jam 100 miles long of solid metal overheating in the sun.

I look forward to the Minister's response to what has been an excellent debate. I have much more to say, but I will say it to him in private. In the meantime, will he please relieve constituents of these menacing humps? If they were in a piece of science fiction, they would not stop growing.

1.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I too congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann), not only on securing the debate but on the forceful way in which he made his points. I must say that I would not like to get on the wrong side of him.

Mr. Steen: You are.

Mr. Jamieson: Well, hon. Members have not yet heard what I have to say. Anyway, my hon. Friend is a doughty fighter for his constituents and, as always, proved it today on behalf of Manton.

My hon. Friend tabled a question for yesterday's Question Time, but unfortunately it was not reached. If it had been, we might have been able to rehearse some arguments for today. He says that in his area road humps have spread like a plague, but I think the biggest plague on the roads is death. Each day an average of nine people die on the roads, and about 10 times as many are seriously injured.

The debate eventually turned into what was almost an attack on local authorities, which are responsible for introducing traffic-calming measures. The hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) said that his authority was getting too much money. I made a note of that: I am sure that members of all parties in his local authority will be interested to learn of his view, and we shall certainly take account of it in the next spending round relating to local transport plans. My Plymouth constituents will be very pleased to receive some of the money that the hon. Gentleman thinks should not be spent in his area.

My hon. Friend said that road humps got stuck on housing estates. The fact is that it is on such estates that most accidents occur, especially those involving young children. Analysis of road casualty figures shows that the poorer and more disadvantaged people are—especially elderly people and children—the more likely they are to be killed or seriously injured on the roads. I do not know my hon. Friend's constituency very well, but I have some knowledge of it, and I believe that it contains some very poor areas. Middle-class children are involved in such accidents less often than poorer children, who are injured in collisions while travelling to and from school.

I accept that road humps are sometimes inconvenient. My hon. Friend, who made some good points, says that the local authority has not taken proper cognisance of local people's wishes.

John Mann: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Jamieson: Certainly.

John Mann: According to statistics, all child deaths in the area have occurred on major roads. The biggest irony is that on Retford road—the main road that runs alongside the Manton estate, the road on which the estate was built, the road to the pit—there is no traffic calming, but that is the road on which young people have died. There have been no child deaths on the estate. I have no objection to road-safety and traffic-calming measures on estates or main roads, but the main problem is the absence of local support—and that is partly because all the humps are dumped in the side streets rather than on the main roads.

Mr. Jamieson: My hon. Friend and I are in agreement: road-safety and traffic-calming measures should be introduced where there is a need for them. Where children and other vulnerable people are seen to be at risk, traffic-calming measures of whatever kind should be established. Speed safety cameras, for instance, should be installed in areas where there is excess speeding leading to casualties, rather than being put just anywhere on our roads. That too is a determined policy of this Government.

The experience of my hon. Friend is not shared across the country, although I am sure that it is the experience of people in his area. I can speak of my constituency and the many other areas that I have visited in my capacity as the Minister responsible for road safety. In my area, one of the worst roads through a council estate that was built in the post-war years, in the 1950s and 1960s, had a horrendous accident record. Again, mainly elderly people and youngsters were affected. Traffic-calming measures—humps and chicanes—have been installed on that road. If I proposed that they should be removed, there would be a riot in that area, because people know that there would be a return to the deaths and injuries of some eight or nine years ago, before the measures were put in place.

My hon. Friend also mentioned vehicle damage and discomfort. He said that claims had been made that road humps caused damage to vehicles and injury to vehicle occupants, especially professional drivers and the disabled. Complaints of that type have been made many times since road humps were first introduced, but no firm evidence has emerged. As a result, the Department has commissioned research by the Transport Research Laboratory into vehicle damage and the possible creation of physical problems. The project is due for completion in September 2003, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will be interested in its outcome.

[Mr. Jamieson]

Combating excessive and inappropriate speed is a complex issue that does not have just one solution. I believe that my hon. Friend and I agree about that. The Department undertook and published a fundamental review of speed policy two years ago. Its recommendations were accepted by the Government and incorporated into the road safety strategy. The speed review concluded that speed limits should be set at levels that are safe, suitable for the road function and at levels most likely to be respected by drivers. Motorists are less willing to comply with limits set at inappropriate levels. We are working on improving information and guidance to local authorities on setting local speed limits.

Obviously, we would like drivers voluntarily to stick to the speed limit. Unfortunately, experience shows that the majority are reluctant to do so unless there are proven traffic-calming measures in place that persuade them that a lower speed is appropriate.

Mr. Steen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Jamieson: No, I will not. The hon. Gentleman has had long enough, and I need time to respond.

We accept that traffic calming—road humps, speed cushions and speed tables—is not a panacea or the only answer to the problem. However, the clear evidence that we have from around the country, from people in local areas and on local councils, is that they are successful and effective safety measures for reducing vehicle speeds in some areas. Their effectiveness is more prevalent in the urban areas to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw referred. However, I accept his point that it is not just a matter of setting a speed limit. Local authorities can bring in 20 mph zones, which may be humped or subject to other measures. Such zones may be far more acceptable to the people who live in the area.

My hon. Friend mentioned home zones. I am sorry that he does not have one in his area. I had the pleasure of opening one in my constituency on Friday that, I must admit, involved certain changes to the road surface. It is now extremely difficult to drive at more than 10 mph in that area, and the zone has the total, absolute support of the whole of that community, because they do not want their road used as a rat run, nor do they want people coming from outside using their roads and putting them and their children at risk and in danger.

The Government have operated several pilot projects. We have put £30 million into the home zone scheme for this year. I suggest that my hon. Friend do some lobbying to get one in his area. The beauty of the home zone concept is that it is very much led by the community. In my area, the people of the community decided what they wanted. The number of flower-beds has increased, and the improvements to the area are substantial. I remind my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Totnes that the local authority must decide on road humps, although I accept my hon. Friend's point that they can be inappropriate. If they are inappropriate, he needs to beat a path to the door of the local council in that area and make those points very forcefully. The good news is that his local authority has had a very substantial increase in funds through the local transport plan. It has received about £15.3 million in the year 2001–02, which is an increase of 120 per cent. That will give Nottinghamshire county council the opportunity to use some of that money to create the sort of zones that people want and accept.

Mr. Eric Illsley (in the Chair): We now come to the next debate.

Gypsy Sites (Kent)

1.30 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent): May I start by thanking you, Mr. Illsley, for sparing the time to preside over the debate this afternoon, and through you, thank the Speaker's Office for granting me the debate? I also thank the Minister for taking the time this afternoon to respond on behalf of the Government.

I greatly regret that it was necessary to bring you here this afternoon, Mr. Illsley. The issues that will be raised were raised in a letter that I wrote to the relevant Secretary of State, enclosing the arguments from Maidstone borough council. One letter was sent on 30 April, and the second was sent on 19 June. I greatly regret that neither letter has been acknowledged or responded to. That is the reason why we are here this afternoon.

The aim of the debate is to correct an injustice, which has been caused by a change in the Planning Inspectorate's attitude to gypsies. It is important to start with one qualification. I am not in any way against gypsies, nor are the overwhelming majority of ordinary people. It is quite right that they should enjoy the same rights and protection under English law as anyone else. However, they now have a de facto range of rights under planning law that is simply denied to ordinary residents, which has been caused directly by the actions of the Planning Inspectorate.

I raise the matter as a constituency MP. I do so on behalf of the residents of Lenham road in Headcorn, the residents of Sutton Valence and Chart Sutton, and several councillors who have come to see me, deeply concerned about the issue. However, it is not simply a problem in Faversham and Mid-Kent. It is a problem throughout Kent, and is just rearing its head on the Isle of Sheppey in the northern part of my constituency. Since the debate has been tabled, several of my colleagues in the House have seen me about the issue to point out that it is a problem across large areas of the south-east. I have been asked to raise it by all levels of government in Kent.

The leader of Kent county council wrote to me last week and said:

> "I am deeply aware of the public's growing concern about gypsies in Kent."

The director of development services and the deputy chief executive of Maidstone borough council—not a Conservative council—wrote to me and said:

> "I can only presume that advice which the Inspectorate is now receiving from the Government is leading to the very lenient approach . . . Local residents are being severely disadvantaged."

A representative of the parish council in the area in my constituency most affected, Headcorn, wrote and said:

> "My council"—

that is Headcorn—

> "is very concerned that it is the Government Department which is causing the increasing problem of the concentration of gypsy sites. My council is dismayed at what appears to be a change in planning policies by the Inspectorate in favour of those with gypsy origins. There is clear discrimination against other residents."

So what is the background to the problem? Kent has traditionally been an area popular with gypsies. It is largely rural, or was in the past. It has beautiful countryside—after all, it is the garden of England—and has plentiful casual labour, particularly in the seasonal fruit-picking industry. There has therefore always been enormous pressure for sites, particularly across the Weald. One can see that in areas like Yalding, Headcorn, Sutton Valence and Chart Sutton. As a result, Maidstone borough council, which only covers a small part of the Weald, has 44 per cent. of the private gypsy site provision in the county of Kent—a staggeringly large proportion.

These days Kent is, of course, no longer a predominantly rural county supported by an agricultural economy. Furthermore, Government policy is encouraging housebuilding across Kent. It is now less easy to support the lifestyles of the gypsy community and far less easy to explain to existing householders why gypsies should be a special case.

Maidstone borough council, which has 44 per cent. of the gypsy site provision across Kent, only covers a small part of the Weald. Its particular problem is further exacerbated by the fact that the whole of the northern part of the borough, in effect the north downs, is an area of outstanding natural beauty. Government policy specifically discourages the provision of gypsy sites in such areas, and there is enormous pressure on the very fragile environment on the Weald. Despite that, Maidstone borough council has fulfilled the requirements of Government circular No. 1/94. In the 1993 local plan and the December 2000 borough-wide local plan, it set out criteria-based policies to indicate how it would provide for gypsy sites.

The problems in the last couple of years are threefold. First, gypsies have started to buy land, move on to it illegally and gain planning permission. They have been able to do that because the Government planning inspector is now granting permission and overturning the borough council's decisions.

Secondly, a large number of gypsy caravans are moving on to land owned by a gypsy who has permission for only one caravan. One can see that problem at the moment in places such as Redhill stables on the Lenham road in Headcorn and Pear orchard in Yalding. The lives of residents in those areas are being made a misery.

Thirdly, large numbers of gypsy caravans, often numbering 30 or 40, are moving to Kent and camping illegally on private land. The High Court is not allocating enough time for urgent hearings to allow local borough councils to evict illegal occupiers of private land.

I want to focus on the first of those problems this afternoon, the consequences of which are obvious. The countryside where gypsies stay is ruined. Remember that that part of the country is well known as the garden of England. The quality of life for existing residents declines very quickly. I have constituents who are unable to open their windows during the summer because a gypsy site across the road burns tyres all day long. House prices in those areas suffer and fall very quickly, for the obvious reason that people do not want to buy houses with gypsy sites around them.

[Hugh Robertson]

I regret to say this, but there has been a certain amount of low-level intimidation of residents. An old-age pensioner, who is just over 90, objected to a gypsy site next door to his house and found a knife on his doorstep the next morning. Two old-age pensioners live just off the Lenham road, opposite a gypsy site that allows two rottweilers to roam free. The rottweilers came across the road and through the hedge, and nearly killed the pensioners' pet terrier. The pensioners are now afraid to go out in their garden during the summer. Also, of course, the crime rate has risen.

The cause of those problems, which is very clear to me as the constituency MP and to local parish councillors, the borough council and Kent county council, is simply the actions of the Planning Inspectorate. We have reached a stage at which Maidstone borough council is unwilling to take any form of enforcement action against gypsies because it knows that it will lose on appeal.

The evidence for that is not only in the letters, about which I have talked this afternoon, that have been written to me, but in a parliamentary written answer from the Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions, which disclosed that in 1996 only 19 per cent. of appeals were allowed by the inspectorate. In 2001, that figure had risen to 57 per cent. The reason why the figure increased is clear: the inspectors are accepting planning policy arguments against the granting of permission, but are allowing planning appeals for reasons such as the Human Rights Act 1998 or personal circumstances relating to individual gypsies.

An extremely good example of that is the recent appeal decision in the case of Greengates, Lenham road, Headcorn, Kent. The inspector, Miss Katie Peerless, states:

> "Therefore, I consider that, on balance, the proposed development conflicts both with Development Plan policies designed to protect the countryside and Special Landscape Area and also those aimed at providing suitable sites for gypsy caravans. If no other material consideration were found to outweigh the presumption against the proposals, then the appeal would be dismissed."

However, she goes on to allow the appeal.

That flies in the face of Government planning policy guidance notes, which indicate that personal circumstances will seldom be such as to set aside development plan policies. Furthermore, I very much doubt that the Human Rights Act was ever intended to set aside planning policies that have evolved through the full democratic process, or to provide for what amounts to positive discrimination in favour of an ethnic group.

I therefore ask the Minister to accept that the change in the actions of the Planning Inspectorate over the past three or four years has favoured gypsies. Evidence of that is in the findings of Kent county council, borough councils throughout the Weald, parish councils and in my observations as a constituency MP. If that is not enough, it has also been proved in a parliamentary written answer. I ask the Minister to accept that that situation is unfair to existing local residents. There can be no reason why gypsies should be allowed to develop housing in a manner denied to non-gypsy people. That must be unjust.

Has there been any change in the Government guidelines given to the Planning Inspectorate? If there has, when was it announced? If there has not, I ask the Minister to undertake to write to the inspectorate and ensure that the correct guidelines are properly interpreted in future. That will place both gypsies and local residents on an equal and fair footing under planning law.

1.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): I congratulate the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) on securing the debate, and on raising some important issues about gypsies and the planning system, particularly in relation to Kent. I hope to deal with many of his points.

The Government recognise that gypsies have a right to pursue their lifestyle and are committed to ensuring that the planning system treats members of that community as fairly as everybody else. The notion, spurious or otherwise, that the planning system provides de facto rights to any particular group, or that such rights exist for the gypsy community, is a nonsense. At best, the hon. Gentleman has offered casual empiricism as evidence of that; at worst, he has provided one parliamentary answer, which I suspect has been taken wholly out of context. He would have been better served to have gone through each and every case covered by the parliamentary answer to find some substance to give me, but substance came there none.

I repeat that no de facto rights have emerged over recent years in relation to the treatment of gypsies or anybody else under the law. The hon. Gentleman himself alluded to the fact that the root of much of our current planning policy is in Government circular No. 1/94 on gypsy sites and planning, with the emphasis very much on the "94". The legal and statutory framework for dealing with gypsies in this country under the planning system has been, and remains, that outlined in the 1994 circular.

I am not disparaging of the experience faced by the hon. Gentleman's constituents—I have heard of similar cases on numerous occasions and have experienced them in my own constituency. However, I was almost waiting to hear mention of the lone gunman on the grassy knoll in what became a nasty, over-politicised conspiracy theory about everything shifting since Labour came to office. From what I know of the hon. Gentleman, that is utterly unworthy of him. If there are difficulties with the reaction of the communities in his area of Kent to what prevails under the planning system, there are better ways of raising them than the way in which he did so, which was wholly and utterly unworthy.

Hugh Robertson: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. McNulty: Once.

Hugh Robertson: The Minister should accept—he almost said so, but not quite—that at no stage did I say that that had occurred as a result of the 1997 election. I merely gave the figures that the Minister's own Department had produced, showing that in 1996 19 per cent. of appeals were allowed and in 2001 that figure had risen to 57 per cent. I went on to say that I had been asked to raise the matter by parish councils, borough councils and Kent county council. If the Minister thinks that I dreamt it up last night as a clever political scam, he is simply mistaken.

Mr. McNulty: I do not want to be overly contentious, but if that is the best the hon. Gentleman can do, he is, at best, naive and, at worst, duplicitous—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order.

Mr. McNulty: I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman is, at worst, misguided. He cannot quote at length from Headcorn parish council saying that it is a huge conspiracy and has changed since Labour came to office, and then quote from Maidstone borough council, which said in a totally and utterly disreputable way—I shall check up on that when I leave the debate—that it is not bothering with enforcement any more. Is that supposed to be serving the community in the Maidstone borough? The council, not the Planning Inspectorate or the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, should be ashamed of itself. It has fiduciary, public policy and other duties, and the letter of the law to carry out and should do so. I shall check in Hansard to see what the hon. Gentleman said. If Maidstone borough council's policy, explicit or otherwise, when it should be enforcing eviction powers is that it cannot be bothered because it might lose on appeal, that is to its shame. It is irrelevant to me what its political persuasion is.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: No, I will not. It is common courtesy in this place when intervening during a 30-minute debate to give notice to both sides in advance. I have had no such notice from the hon. Gentleman, so I shall not give way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is actually common courtesy to give notice to the hon. Member introducing the debate, the Minister and the Chair.

Mr. McNulty: Absolutely, and that has not been forthcoming, so I will not give way.

The key point is that the regulatory framework remains as it always has been. There is no positive discrimination towards any group in the planning process and to say so with such flimsy and casually empirical evidence undermines not only the hon. Gentleman, but the Planning Inspectorate. I had the great pleasure, as one of my first duties only last week, of visiting the Planning Inspectorate and I looked deep into the bowels of the machine to see what it does. I have nothing but the highest regard for it.

There are three key elements in our policy on gypsies and travellers. All are about to come to fruition and one that has already done so is the announcement of this year's round of the three-year plan for gypsy site refurbishment grants, because we are keen to obviate the need for anyone to move on to unauthorised and illegal encampments. Secondly, because it has been less than clear what provision is required for the community, two bodies of research will probably be published before the summer, which we hope will inform not just local government but central Government. Thirdly, in the very near future, as part of the three prongs of policy on travellers, we shall issue renewed and updated guidance, which the hon. Gentleman should read at his leisure with great care and attention. I hope that within that new guidance the notion of rights and responsibilities for all parties will be clear and explicit.

Those three elements will not only inform how we go forward but enable us, working with responsible local government, to deal with the issue with a degree of parity all round. I am very pleased that the hon. Gentleman started from the premise that he has no objection, violent or otherwise, to the gypsy community. Implicit in his remarks was the recognition that it has the same rights as every other community. However, the issues of illegal, unauthorised encampments and of where some members of the community buy land are very real.

The Planning Inspectorate's powers are determined in accordance with the requirements of section 54A of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, as amended, which states that applications and appeals should be determined in accordance with the development plan unless material considerations indicate otherwise.

If planning permission is refused by the local planning authority or an enforcement notice is served in order to remedy a breach of planning control, there is a right of appeal to the First Secretary of State. That right of appeal is an integral and long-established part of the planning system. Given that, by definition, someone always has to lose an appeal, there will always be aggrieved parties. However, having had 11 years' experience on a planning committee, I would suggest that planning authorities and everyone involved would like the world to be as clear cut as the hon. Gentleman seems to suggest it should be.

The vast majority of appeals are transferred to inspectors to determine on the First Secretary of State's behalf. When inspectors are instructed to hold inquiries on behalf of the First Secretary of State, or appointed to determine appeals, they stand in the shoes of the First Secretary of State and must have regard to his policies. Each inspector, in exercising the duty of making a recommendation or determining an appeal, is technically a tribunal.

It is a basic principle that in an appeal or other case in which an inspector is instructed or appointed, there should be no evidence or policy advice relevant to the case before the inspector that is not also available to all the parties.

The Planning Inspectorate has an impressive reputation in its handling of planning appeals. The integrity, impartiality and fairness with which each appeal is handled are widely acknowledged. Every issue that is a material consideration in assessing a proposal, whether of local or national importance, is taken into account by an inspector at appeal stage. As I said, the hon. Gentleman knows that I cannot refer specifically to any of the cases that he has outlined.

[Mr. McNulty]

Through the inspectorate's work, disputes between individuals and public authorities are resolved taking into account the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, as amended, any other legislation relevant to the inspectorate's casework, the First Secretary of State's policies and, where relevant, the development plan.

Government policies on relevant areas of environmental concern—not just those directly related to town and country planning matters—may also be taken into account. It is for the inspector to weigh up often conflicting considerations and to make a decision. It is very much a balancing exercise and one that the Planning Inspectorate carries out in an extremely fair and robust fashion.

Inspectors bring their own experience, expertise and common sense to bear in interpreting and weighing the evidence before them. Like the decisions of judicial tribunals, inspectors' decisions or recommendations must flow from the evidence before them, not from any external source. In all cases planning inspectors are fully briefed on the circumstances of the appeal proposal and will visit the site to familiarise themselves with its location and surroundings. Each decision is reached, therefore, only after careful consideration of all the relevant planning issues, including the likely effect of the proposed development on the surrounding area, and taking into account the views of the local planning authority and local residents.

The Planning Inspectorate aims for the highest quality in the way that it handles casework and in the speed and quality of its decisions. The Franks principles of openness, fairness and impartiality continue to be the watchwords under which all decisions are taken. However, as nearly all decisions go against at least one of the parties involved in the appeal, the inspectorate knows that it will also receive complaints.

I have explained my absolute confidence in the integrity of the planning inspectors and the way in which the inspectorate handles planning cases. I do not feel, therefore, that there is any need to write to them in the terms suggested by the hon. Gentleman. I say that as someone who has been on the wrong end of what I considered to be perverse decisions during my 11 years as a councillor on a planning committee. I do not, even as a Minister, speak out of any great love for the inspectorate—I simply recognise its objectivity, integrity and, above all, professionalism.

As the hon. Gentleman may know, the Advisory Panel on Standards in the Planning Inspectorate—APOS—is an independent body that advises the First Secretary of State on the maintenance and enhancement of professional standards in the Planning Inspectorate. Members are volunteers drawn from the legal, surveying, planning, architectural, engineering and other relevant professions.

In advising the First Secretary of State, the panel investigates issues that may impinge on the quality of Planning Inspectorate decisions, such as the number of planning inspectors and their training and administrative support. The latest annual report to the First Secretary of State confirmed that the ministerial target on quality for the year 2000–01 had been met. It concluded that the inspectorate > "demonstrated to us their commitment to maintaining, and where possible, improving their standard of service across the very wide range of activities—99 per cent. of their casework was free from justified complaint."

To answer the hon. Gentleman's suggestions, therefore, I do not believe that various de facto rights have been merged, and there is no legal context in which that could happen because of inspectorate decisions. The inspectorate does not exercise positive discrimination on behalf of the Government or of its own volition, and, given the flimsy evidence presented in the debate, I see no virtue in writing to it in any capacity.

As I said at the beginning, I fully recognise the gypsy community's concerns about site provision, with all that flows from that, and the real dislocation and hardship that illegal and unauthorised encampments can cause.

In conclusion, I suggest that the hon. Gentleman looks to his own lights and to the assorted authorities—from Headcorn and Maidstone to Kent county council—that serve the same area that he does. He should remonstrate with them, and get them to use their powers under the law as effectively as they can.

Question put and agreed to.

2.30 pm

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): It gives me great pleasure to introduce a debate on not one but three reports on Ofsted. They are the products of a great deal of hard work by the Education and Skills Committee. I say that with extra feeling, as we have only just finished the final session of an inquiry into student finance, which I suspect will be the subject of debates in this Chamber and on the Floor of the House. The report will be published next Thursday. Today, however, we are discussing the fruition of another part of the production process of a busy Select Committee. It was a great privilege, last Thursday, to have a Supply day debate on the Committee's individual learning accounts report; now, in this much more intimate and comfortable Chamber, we are discussing the Committee's three reports on Ofsted.

The Select Committee takes its responsibilities for Ofsted very seriously. The responsibility that Ofsted and the chief inspector of schools have to the House of Commons and to Parliament has been a matter for debate for some time, but it has been clearly established over the past five years that the chief inspector, representing Ofsted, is responsible to Parliament through the Select Committee. Indeed, that has been accepted by the Prime Minister and successive Secretaries of State. It is an important part of our parliamentary responsibilities. Having established that, we have to take our responsibilities ever more seriously, because Ofsted is a growing business.

I was checking—or rather, I should be truthful and say that my research assistant was checking—the number of people employed by Ofsted over the years. I was astonished at the numbers. In 1995–96 the Department for Education and Employment had 6,528 employees; on 1 February, the Department for Education and Skills had 5,425—nearly five and a half thousand civil servants. In 1995–96 Ofsted had 511 staff; but on 1 February, it had 1,494 full-time employees. That is a dramatic increase.

There has also been a dramatic increase in Ofsted's budget. In 1993–94 Ofsted spent £46 million; this year it plans to spend £197 million—a real-terms increase of £150 million, or 240 per cent. That does not mean that Ofsted has grown for the sake of it; it has been given a great deal more responsibility. Hon. Members will know that its remit now runs into early years education, teacher education, further education, prison education and education in the independent sector. We parliamentarians should appreciate the size of the organisation that we are charged with overseeing. It makes our job of scrutiny ever more important.

At present, we meet the chief inspector twice a year to discuss his annual report and his conduct of the job and Ofsted's development under his charge. The meetings are slightly different, but it is important to get that contrast.

I suspect that with the growth of Ofsted we will have to consider whether there is enough scrutiny. You will know better than most, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that a pioneering change in our constitution will begin the week after next, when members of the Liaison Committee will have their first meeting with the Prime Minister. That will happen twice a year from now on. The Committee will ask the Prime Minister questions about his role and his conduct of his office for two and a half hours. That is a breakthrough and a welcome change in parliamentary responsibility, activity and scrutiny.

However, considering the growth of Ofsted, we should not be content with the current arrangements. Having established two meetings a year, we should examine innovative ways of establishing a better relationship. One of the best ways of doing that is dealt with in one of the reports—changing the manner of the appointment of the chief inspector. This is not a comment on David Bell, the newly appointed chief inspector; it is question of what the Committee believes is the right way to appoint a chief inspector.

We have said from the beginning that the process should be more open and transparent, and should be handled differently. In a previous report, we called for a process by which the Committee evaluated the candidates and had a clear role in choosing the new chief inspector. That process could be refined and some of us would even argue—I am not sure that I dare say this, and I am looking round at my colleagues to find out whether they agree—that the Chairman or a member of the Select Committee should be on the appointing committee, as a step towards a different system.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): I am grateful that my hon. Friend has chosen to focus on this issue so early in his introduction to the debate. The recent report by the Modernisation Committee about the future role of Select Committees, which now almost have a job description, extends their brief quite significantly. Does my hon. Friend think that in that report an opportunity was missed to include in their new role across-the-board responsibility for hearings on major public appointments relevant to each Committee?

Mr. Sheerman: I thank my colleague on the Select Committee for that intervention. I was coming to that, and he saved me from making a long reference to it.

[Mr. Sheerman]

There have been some missed opportunities, but most Members are aware that the Liaison Committee has been taking a strong leadership role in the regeneration and renaissance of Parliament through its powers of scrutiny and much else. For our Select Committee and its relationship with Ofsted and other major educational quangos, we believe that that kind of scrutiny is important right across the piece. That is why I started with the constitutional part of the Ofsted report and the question of getting the relationship right.

The main purpose of a Select Committee is the scrutiny of the Executive. We start with that, and if we get that wrong we do nothing well. That is why our Select Committee, as soon as a new Committee was formed with a new Chair after the election, set itself to re-establishing the importance of the scrutiny role and placing it at the heart of our existence. That is why we called in all six Ministers, starting with the Secretary of State.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) will smile a little at that, because it took us 10 months to get through the process, only for there to be ministerial changes. I am sure that the present Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), who is with us today, is looking forward to being scrutinised shortly by the Select Committee. It is an interesting and vital process, and my hon. Friend is right about the importance of such matters.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): In naming me, the hon. Gentleman has given me an enthusiasm for the job. I shall compliment him later on the fact that Ofsted is being held to account more than in previous years.

One issue that particularly concerns me is how we judge the accuracy and veracity of inspectors' work. That issue does not appear in the report, although the present arrangements are dismissed in the evidence given by Professor Fitz-Gibbon of Durham university. Inspectors judge individual lessons, and base their judgment of the school on an amalgam of those lessons. It is important that there is independent research into their methodology and into assessments, accreditation and the accumulation of information in what is, after all, a judgmental process. Why did the Committee not feel that it was important to ask the chief inspector to carry out such research, as Professor Fitz-Gibbon and her colleagues suggested?

Mr. Sheerman: As usual, the hon. Gentleman has made a rather good mini-speech in his intervention. I know where he is coming from, and I shall talk about his concern in a moment, once I have set it in the context of the next part of my speech. I shall not keep hon. Members long, because many of my colleagues want to speak in this short debate.

I want to establish the constitutional background to what we do, and to explain how big Ofsted is and what role it plays. I shall then explain why it is so important that we get our scrutiny right.

The Government have continued the growth of Ofsted, and it is an expensive item. As I said, it has nearly 1,500 employees, not including the many on short-term contracts who inspect schools. It is much bigger than is suggested by the figures that we have given or by the budget in its entirety; it is an enormous operation.

What is the purpose of Ofsted if it does not work, and does not improve schools? It was introduced so that we could assess the quality of teaching, education and the teaching and learning experience in the classroom, but if it does not do that, and does not help to raise standards, why do we have it? That is the crucial question that we must all ask. If it does not drive up standards, we have every right to say that it is a poor use of taxpayers' money.

When Professor Fitz-Gibbon and many of her academic colleagues wrote to us suggesting that there should be a royal commission, it was refreshing, in a sense, because we like to have a good relationship with the academic community. Indeed, we spend a lot of time during inquiries hearing evidence from academic experts, and we have just taken evidence from a whole range of them in our inquiry into student financing and individual learning accounts. However, we were a little peeved by the request for a royal commission, because there is no need for one if we are doing our job well. That request therefore renewed the energy with which we come to our job, and we are ever more vigilant in the questions that we ask.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough said that we did not ask all the right questions when we last saw the chief inspector. Our questioning will change, although our track record on questioning the chief inspector and calling him to account is not bad. Nevertheless, we do not get everything right. Some people believe that we questioned a former chief inspector a little too hard and too vigorously, because he resigned the next day—although that was nothing to do with our inquiry or our questions, although we ask hard questions. We persist with our interrogation until we have the answers that we require.

From our investigation, we believe that there is a fair case for saying that the introduction of Ofsted and its growth, expansion and operation has been in the plus column of the accounts of the national education system. The process of evaluation and inspection has helped the Government to be more competent and focused in their knowledge of the quality of education, and has helped to provide the information that the Department for Education and Skills can then act on to drive up standards.

I make no apologies; it is our remit to scrutinise increasingly. If the empire becomes larger and larger and we cannot see a benefit from the process to the taxpayer, the consumer and, most of all, the student, it is our job to make a loud noise about that. We listened carefully to Professor Fitz-Gibbon and her colleagues. We will ask them to talk to the Committee so that we understand the arguments even better and our questions can be even sharper in future.

I come from the old management school that used to say that if something could not be measured, it could not be managed. I think that it still believes that. We all have to face the tremendous drive to know what is out there in our education system and to measure it, so that we know how children are doing. We must know the level of literacy and numeracy. If children cannot read and write, they cannot fulfil their potential for all the other things that they could do in their lives. It is a barrier to making their lives complete. I make no excuse for supporting programmes under this and the previous Administration that were meant to find out what the educational situation in this country was, evaluate it, measure it and then have targets to drive standards up. Ofsted should be judged on whether that process is successful.

Ofsted will not get everything right. We must carefully watch its interesting transition from focus on one aspect of education to involvement in many more aspects. It is always dangerous when an organisation triples in size, budget and personpower, so this is a difficult time. We have to see whether the transition works. Whenever there is even the smallest mistake that involves an examination board and siren voices call for only one body, I am always resistant. In walks of life in which I have been involved, it is sometimes dangerous to have one national body that covers everything.

Mr. Willis: There is only one Ofsted.

Mr. Sheerman: That is an aside. I am aware that Ofsted is in a transitional period, and that the role of the Select Committee on Education and Skills is to monitor that carefully.

I do not want to speak for much longer, but it would be unfair if I did not mention the appointment. It was clear that some of our colleagues were irritated about the appointment process. That is not a criticism of the new chief inspector, but even if we put all the arguments about greater transparency and more involvement with the House of Commons and our Select Committee to one side, more experience on the panel that interviewed, assessed and chose the new chief inspector—someone from the private sector, for example—would have been an advantage. To us, the experience did not look broad or diverse enough.

That is not a criticism of David Bell, the new chief inspector, with whom we have had our first meeting. We wanted to meet him early in his career to build the relationship and hear about his aspirations. The interview that we had with him for this report is clearly different from the interview with Mike Tomlinson for the previous report. Mike Tomlinson had been in Ofsted for a long time, had a long track record as a deputy and fulfilled an interesting role. It is no secret that Chris Woodhead was a more combative, controversial and sparky character—[Interruption.] Perhaps that is an interesting use of the word "sparky". Mike Tomlinson was more competent and agreeable, and led Ofsted well.

As Chairman of the Select Committee, however, I valued the relationship that we had with Chris Woodhead. He did an enormous amount of work in establishing and developing Ofsted. The Select Committee had its run-ins with him, both under me and under the two previous Chairs, and we disagreed about some of the things that he said that did not seem to be supported by the evidence. The only consistent source of disagreement between the Select Committee under three different Chairs and Ofsted under Chris Woodhead's regime was when what he said was not based on inspection or evidence, but on things that Ofsted had not worked on. In other respects, we had a creative relationship, and I pay tribute to that part of his work.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): I should point out to my hon. Friend that the damage caused by the way in which the former chief inspector would shoot from the hip spread further than Ofsted alone. An Ofsted inspector told me that he was once driving to a school when he heard Chris Woodhead shooting from the hip on the radio. The head teacher from the school also heard the chief inspector's comments, which clouded the whole inspection.

Mr. Sheerman: My great friend and colleague is trying to distract me from giving a balanced evaluation of the former chief inspector. Everyone knows that he and I had disagreements, but I am trying to be fair about a former public servant. He had great strengths but he had weaknesses as well, to which we would refer when we met—we did not keep our objections secret. He ran a different kind of regime. When Mike Woodhead took over—

Mr. Willis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sheerman: No, I am enjoying this.

Mike Woodhead—sorry, I mean Mike Tomlinson—softened the role of Ofsted. As my hon. Friend rightly said, it did no good to anyone that the staff of schools found Ofsted inspections the most frightening, worrying and stressful experience of their entire lives. There was something deeply wrong with that. Mike Tomlinson's regime introduced a different kind of charisma and a new approach. His inspections had a lighter touch. The Select Committee certainly thought that it was unnecessary to put the fear of the Almighty up a teaching body—a group of professionals—to get results.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight): Does the Chairman of the Committee agree that the fear of the Almighty was not necessarily injected by her Majesty's chief inspector? In some cases, the inspection process inspired fear because head teachers, governors or local education authorities were so afraid that their school would fail.

Mr. Sheerman: Yes, there were institutional aspects. No one can take a totally relaxed view of an Ofsted inspection—there is a great deal of stress involved in any Ofsted inspection, even now. However, getting the balance right is important. The person at the head of the organisation can send a message about the balance, and make it clear that he wants a creative relationship between a group of professionals who are desperate to do their job well to provide good quality education and teaching in the classroom. In any organisation, that message from the top makes a great difference, and the transition to Mike Tomlinson changed that message.

Of course, David Bell is unproven, and we must watch carefully to see what happens. He says that he does not go in for the heroic style of leadership, and that is, in a sense, refreshing. However, it is important to get the balance right and not to put the fear of the Almighty into everyone in the belief that that is the way to get the best out of them. I come from a school of management that regards scaring employees to death as an idea from the 19th century.

Most productive modern companies in the private sector do not scare their employees to get the best results. It is important to encourage them, to build their confidence and self-esteem, and to work as a team. Every successful company in the private sector and every organisation in the public sector works best when that sort of positive attitude prevails. I am looking to David Bell to create a constructive relationship and achieve a balanced approach to the job. Of course he will not be a pushover or a soft option. We expect the chief inspector to know what standards he wants to see in the educational establishments of our country—

2.56 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.11 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): We may resume now. I call Mr. Sheerman.

Mr. Sheerman: It is a pleasure to have you in the Chair, Mr. Olner, but I was about to conclude my remarks when we were so rudely interrupted by the Division.

The Committee was somewhat spoiled during our recent individual learning accounts report because we realised how good a relationship we could have with a Minister. I am not sure whether I should say this in this Chamber, but when we received the ministerial responses to the report, they were of such a high quality and so frank in exchanging serious views that it seemed that it was the then Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (John Healey), rather than civil servants, who was writing the stuff. Now, whether we are reading the Timms or the Miliband version in response, we get the feeling that they were written by civil servants without much ministerial input. We would have preferred to be at the level that we attained during the discussions on individual learning accounts, so we were a little disappointed.

We took a long time to take evidence and made some intelligent comments. Those on the Opposition Benches might take me up on that idea, but in the first meeting with the new chief inspector we spoke about the appointment process, pupil behaviour and attendance, teacher recruitment and retention, teacher work load, supply teachers, specialist schools, local authority inspections and penalties for parents who do not sent their children to school. Indeed, we were prescient in some ways, because shortly after we asked the chief inspector whether the penalties for parents who did not co-operate in sending their children to schools were sufficient, we saw the remarkable case of the unfortunate woman who was imprisoned for that.

Although I am in favour of strong, appropriate pressure—I know that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough disagrees—and believe that severe penalties must be handed out to people who do not co-operate in sending their children to school, there are alternatives. I prefer the Australian system of depriving people of their liberty at weekends. It is better process, because it does not take the people away from their family during the week or stop them earning money. The range of penalties must be expanded. As a former shadow Minister for prisons and police, the last thing I want to see is people being sent to prison unnecessarily. It does not do any good—although I know that the courts are forced to do that in some cases.

Mr. Willis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sheerman: No, I want to finish what I am saying.

I have one last comment, and I shall give myself one more minute to speak. Our Committee has had seminars to try to chart the way of adding value as a Committee. We do not want to produce reports that do not add value.

This week, we spent two hours with academics, civil servants, people from Ofsted and others discussing the crucial issue on which Ofsted reported yesterday. What happens to children when they go to secondary school at the age of 11, bright and full of potential? They seem to lose interest in education between 11 and 14. What is going wrong in the education system? Yesterday's report was valuable, and we shall take up that issue when we next see the chief inspector.

Our job is to evaluate the use of taxpayers' money. That is what the job of a scrutinising Committee should be. If Ofsted does not drive up standards, we, not a royal commission, should be first to tell the House and the public. Diversification and plurality, with specialist schools and foundation schools, are the fashion with the Government. If that diversity does not improve standards, we should be the first Committee to say that it is not working—but the jury is out on that.

People can rest assured that the Education and Skills Committee will continue its positive scrutinising relationship with Ofsted, and we look forward to many more positive engagements with it.

3.15 pm

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness): It is a great pleasure to participate in my first debate in connection with the Select Committee on Education and Skills. I had hoped to participate in last week's debate on individual learning accounts, but unfortunately the time scale was truncated, and I was not allowed to do so. It is also a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), the Committee Chairman, whose adroit footwork has enabled many reports to be produced with the full support of all members of the Committee, across political parties. That is a credit to him and his skills as Chairman.

Ofsted is a large subject, and the reports that we are debating cover many issues, but I shall concentrate on the relationship between Ofsted and schools. Ofsted has been a tremendous success in improving standards in schools. The size of Ofsted's role in improving standards is debatable, and more analysis needs to be done, but the principle of external inspection is sound and provides quality assurance.

Whether Ofsted provides value for money is another debate. Let us consider successful schools in particular. Three or four inspectors may spend up to a week in a school telling the school what it already knows. Is that good value for money, particularly when public resources are in such demand in so many sectors?

Liz Blackman (Erewash): Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge the role of the light-touch regime in that regard?

Mr. Simmonds: Yes, I do. I shall say more about that later, but my view is that the light touch needs to become even lighter. More emphasis should perhaps be placed on schools with weaknesses, to prevent some of them from going into special measures, and on schools that are in special measures, to enable them to come out of that situation faster.

I welcome the maturing of Ofsted that has taken place, particularly under Mr. Tomlinson, and the reduction of the burden on schools. The report summarised that by saying that Ofsted had become more responsive, more supportive, better informed and better co-ordinated. However, the evidence taken by the Committee from Mr. Tomlinson, and, more recently, Mr. Bell, was that they felt that the current relationship between Ofsted and schools was satisfactory or almost perfect. I detected a sense of incredulity when they were told that schools did not take the same view.

Let me describe the feedback that I am receiving from schools about the so-called lighter-touch regime that came into existence relatively recently. First, schools believe that they have a "them and us" relationship with Ofsted inspectors. It is not a partnership, and this creates an atmosphere of animosity which, although perhaps not as great as it has been, still exists.

Secondly, Ofsted inspectors have often been described as intransigent. They do not always listen or take on board points made by the teaching staff.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley): Is the hon. Gentleman not generalising? We have also heard evidence that other schools have found the process helpful and supportive. Indeed, there are probably as many different types of Ofsted inspector as there are types of member of the Select Committee.

Mr. Simmonds: I accept what the hon. Lady says. She is quite right to say that that I am generalising, but my point is that the Ofsted inspection process, as it exists today, is not perfect. Improvements could be made to the process, and I do not think that it is unreasonable for me to point out some of the current failings. I agree that the process is more positive than it has been. However, if the process had the same vigour as it started with all those years ago, we would not need this light-touch approach. One statistic that illustrates that point is that nine out of 10 primary schools that have gone through their second Ofsted inspection are significantly better than when they were first inspected. If there had been a loose, light-touch inspection in the first place, we would not be seeing such a high percentage in that category.

There is also the belief that Ofsted is stuck on concentrating too much on paperwork before, during and after the inspection process. Many schools and local education authorities have said to me that if the full implementation of the paperwork processes that Ofsted requires of schools were put into operation 100 per cent. of the time, it would detract from the core focus of teachers in schools, which is providing learning and educational facilities for their pupils. That is primarily a function of time.

Liz Blackman: May I jog the hon. Gentleman's memory? I understand that [illegible] pursued this line of questioning when Mike Tomlinson came before the Select Committee, and Mr. Tomlinson described in detail ways in which the paperwork was being considerably reduced, and returns could be made online. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is merit in that?

Mr. Simmonds: I am delighted that the hon. Lady has read the Select Committee's evidence. Mike Tomlinson referred to 34 areas in which reductions had been made in the bureaucracy demanded of schools that went through the Ofsted process. However, more can be done, and I think that it is right for us to look at ways in which further reductions can be made. I shall say more about that later, if I may.

The report forcefully made the point that the Asssociation of Teachers and Lecturers commended Ofsted for its continuing awareness of the unduly demanding nature of inspections. However, it says:

> "more needs to be done to ensure that schools stop wasting time and effort in excessive pre-inspection paperwork."

I agree with that and look forward to Ofsted's analysis of bureaucracy, which it promised when it came before the Select Committee, and how it can be further reduced, in conjunction with the Minister and his colleagues at the Department. I hope that that will include an analysis of how effective the prescriptive literacy and numeracy hours have been, and the correlation between prescriptive hours and the raising of standards in those areas, because prescription takes away the freedom and innovation from which many schools, particularly primary schools, would benefit.

I wonder whether orders have come to the inspectors from above, either from the Department or the heads of Ofsted. Schools believe that Ofsted inspectors are now much more pleasant to teachers. Although that is a positive step, I suspect that it is not necessarily a function of the Ofsted process, but has happened because the Government do not want any more good teachers to leave the profession, given the present retention crisis.

It cannot be right for schools to spend days and weeks preparing for Ofsted inspections, which distracts them from what they are supposed to be doing and inevitably creates a false impression when the inspectors arrive at the school. There must be scope for successful schools to have a lighter-touch inspection regime than exists at present. I am extremely sympathetic to the argument that unannounced visits and inspections would add a useful tool to Ofsted's armoury, as the school would be seen as it really is, rather than the polished and prepared school that the school governors, teachers and pupils would like it to appear.

[Mr. Simmonds]

I welcome the Ofsted drive to allow more current teachers to be involved in the inspection process. Although that has proved complex as teachers are taken out of the classroom in other schools to take part in inspections, it allows professional development and the exchange of best practice between schools, which did not happen enough in years gone by. It also gets away from the "them and us" dynamic, which still exists, and creates a more positive way forward.

Although I welcome the experimentation in getting feedback from pupils in schools, I question whether they will tell the truth or say how they really feel rather than what they want the Ofsted inspectors to be told. I accept that local authorities should be brought into the loop to discuss a school's performance prior to its Ofsted inspection, although I have heard schools, not necessarily in my constituency, complaining that since the local education authorities are being inspected by Ofsted, they appear to be more interested in passing their own inspections than they are in giving a good and proper service to the schools for which they are supposed to be responsible. I accept that LEAs need to be brought further into the Ofsted inspection process before the inspection, as should other interested parties, as the report states—but there was no mention of bringing parents into the process. If there is one group of people who have an inherent interest in a school's performance—its dynamics and its educational processes for their children—it is the parents of children at the school.

Jonathan Shaw: The hon. Gentleman is, of course, aware, that there are parents consultation meetings prior to school inspections.

Mr. Simmonds: I am aware of that and I thank the hon. Gentleman for pointing it out. However, more could be done with parents in a more formal way, perhaps on the first evening of the Ofsted process or when the inspectors are at the school.

I shall draw my remarks to a close by asking the Minister to encourage the Ofsted process, but to stop trying to micro-manage schools, because most teachers are well aware that the Ofsted process has benefited their schools. However, they—especially the more successful ones—would prefer a lighter touch, and they want to be allowed to teach. There is a direct correlation between the potential and the desire of central Government to micro-manage as many schools as possible and the reluctance of teachers to remain in the education system. It is one of the main, fundamental reasons why many teachers are being driven out of the profession. I plead with the Minister to stop micro-managing, and to support a lighter Ofsted regime.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley): I, too, welcome the opportunity to contribute to this important debate. Hon. Members have talked about the benefits of school inspections and the importance of quality and raising standards, and the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) gave us a good outline of the principle of external inspection.

I particularly welcome the improvements that Mike Tomlinson, the previous chief inspector, described in a letter to schools in September. He paid particular attention to the need to cut bureaucracy. There was a clear emphasis on the importance of not preparing material especially for an inspection. Now that we are some years down the road, we are right to expect schools to have policy statements already in place. Some years ago, I was a governor of a school awaiting its first inspection. As hon. Members will know, at least a year's notice is given, and there was much activity to produce many documents specifically for the inspection. The situation should be different now. Schools are used to the requirements, and it is a matter of Ofsted going in and seeing what is there, rather than there being excessive preparation.

Like the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness, I welcome the involvement of practising teachers. However good Ofsted inspectors may be, many have been out of direct teaching for some time. They do not experience the immediate pressures that teachers face daily as they deal with a range of issues, and therefore have a different perspective. Including practising teachers wherever possible can add to the process a realism about the range of tasks that teachers must perform, the issues that they face and all the other requirements that members of the Government and some Opposition Members would like teachers to fulfil.

I differ from the hon. Gentleman in that I welcome the importance attached to seeking the views of pupils. I believe that skilful Ofsted inspectors could talk to young people about their school and teachers and get sensible opinions. They may not get a full impression if they spend only a short amount of time with them, but if the discussions are conducted properly, they could make an essential contribution to the process.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): I welcome my hon. Friend's contribution. As she knows, the Select Committee took formal evidence from members of the Youth Parliament for the first time, which proved to be a valuable experience. I understand that Ofsted took evidence from young people only once. Does she endorse my view that such evidence should be more widely taken?

Ms Munn: I certainly do, and I agree that it should be part of the inspection. It is important that Ofsted inspectors not only listen to young people, but examine how well schools involve young people in all their processes. Evidence shows that schools do better if they have school councils and other processes for engaging young people in what goes on. More is achieved and behaviour is generally better.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Does the hon. Lady agree that an Ofsted inspector may be more successful in getting a representative view from pupils, rather than a self-selected one? I regret to say that those pupils who came before the Select Committee were articulate but unrepresentative, as more than half of them were from grammar schools, and more than half were doing politics A-level.

Ms Munn: They were clearly unrepresentative. As we know, politics remains a minority interest in most parts of the country.

Jonathan Shaw: Surely it is up to Ofsted inspectors how they consult children or young people in a school. It is not for the Government to prescribe the method. The discussion could be formal or informal. Any Ofsted inspector worth his salt would know whether the wrong children were being selected for such a consultation.

On resuming—

Ms Munn: For those who can remember the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw), the answer is yes, I entirely agree.

We are pressed for time, so I shall move on to other issues that the Select Committee considered. In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), I welcomed the change in tone when we met Mike Tomlinson. Ofsted should be challenging, but most teachers and schools want improvements in teaching and attainment, so the process should be supportive and challenging rather than confrontational.

Our hearing with the new chief inspector was positive and I particularly welcomed the opportunity to explore the gap between the best and worst performing schools. I referred during the hearing to Myrtle Springs, a school in my constituency, which was involved in special measures. The school found its recent Ofsted inspection helpful and supportive of the improvements that were already beginning to take place. The school was commended for its approach and its hard work.

The school is raising standards, but because of the area and range of children attending, we should recognise that it is unlikely to appear high up in the league tables. The school works well with children with learning difficulties, using the learning mentors introduced by the Government. One concern raised with me by the head teacher is that league tables often lead to the labelling of schools as either good or bad. Whatever we say about that, the children begin to feel it themselves, which takes us back into the cycle of issues about aspirations, expectations and self-fulfilling prophecies. It is a problem that we must tackle.

I asked David Bell how schools that were good at tackling problems such as social exclusion—including helping pupils who had been failing elsewhere to achieve positive results—should be reported. I shall refer briefly to his response, which was not necessarily what I was looking for:

> "It is a very, very important policy issue and therefore OFSTED has an extremely important role in reporting. I just held my fire yesterday and perhaps you will forgive me if I hold my fire on this one because it is a very serious issue and I think it is one that I want to study within OFSTED."

I told him that I would ask the same question next time, and he said that he would prepare for it. I hope that the issue will stay on his agenda.

We have heard some positive reports about schools coming out of special measures. I have experienced the joy of writing to several head teachers in my constituency to say well done—well done to head teachers, teachers, parents and children in building a partnership to lift schools out of special measures and to provide pupils with real hope of educational achievement.

Other schools facing serious weaknesses, however, do not secure the early intervention and help necessary to prevent them from going into special measures. Is Ofsted going into schools often enough? Is a combination of Ofsted reports and local education authority oversight of schools necessary? Some believe that LEAs should not have much of a role in schools, but I disagree because they can provide important external support. Some LEAs have not been doing that job, which is why I welcomed Ofsted inspections of them. But there is a question of how we can help those schools with serious weaknesses. I hope that the issue will be addressed by both the Department for Education and Skills and Ofsted.

Finally and briefly, I want to refer to early years. That did not appear in the chief inspector's report for 2001–02 because it is a new area that Ofsted has taken on. A number of us on the Education and Skills Committee, particularly those of us who come from a social work background, were concerned about what would happen when Ofsted took over the inspection and regulation of child minders. The previous regime looked at child care and the other issues that are important to children's early development in such a way that they did not get lost in what could become an over-riding education agenda. While obviously—

Ms Munn: That suspension allowed me briefly to support Bradford's bid to be city of culture, which I am sure will please my colleagues from Yorkshire.

On early years, finally, the Select Committee raised the issues of physical chastisement by child minders and smoking. Those matters have often been discussed at length. I shall not do so today; I do not want to be interrupted again. I hope that in future reports, the Select Committee will pay more attention to issues relating to early years.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. Hon. Members have indicated that they wish to finish as near to 5.30 pm as possible. Unfortunately, there have been four Divisions in the House, and others are threatened. So that I can call as many hon. Members as possible, I ask the remaining speakers to be reasonably quick and sharp.

4.26 pm

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield): I should declare two interests. First, as a member of the Education and Skills Committee, obviously I am delighted to be present to discuss the report. Secondly, I was a teacher for 22 years, and more importantly, I was subject to two Ofsted inspections in five years. One was only just over 18 months ago, so it is very fresh in my memory.

In the light of that, I shall deal mainly with some of the concerns about Ofsted inspections and accountability that were discussed by the Committee with the then chief inspector, Mike Tomlinson. There has undoubtedly been an improvement in the approach of Ofsted since Mr. Woodhead moved on. There is a more positive approach, but it must be said that the Ofsted process is still judgmental, rather than developmental.

In Committee, the hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Pollard) asked Mr. Tomlinson about the stress, fear and trepidation that he had witnessed when inspections took place in a school where he was a governor. Mr. Tomlinson told the Select Committee that schools actually welcomed inspection and that > "returns from school had teachers expressing overwhelming satisfaction with all aspects of inspection."

I had to disagree entirely with that, based on my experience of two inspections, and on the experience of many colleagues and friends from other schools. Other members of the Committee also disagreed, on the basis of evidence gained from visiting schools in their constituencies. I can confidently say that I have never met a teacher who welcomed an Ofsted inspection, whether they, their department or their school had a glowing report or a bad one.

Why is that? We have heard several reasons from hon. Members. We have heard about "shooting from the hip", although thankfully that seems to have ended with the departure of Mr. Woodhead. Another reason is the work load involved in preparing for an inspection. The report and Mr. Tomlinson's evidence to the Committee dealt with ways in which Ofsted was trying to reduce the amount of preparation involved, although if a school is to be judged on the basis of a snapshot inspection, it will inevitably do a great deal of preparation in an attempt to get a favourable judgment.

Many teachers lack confidence in the inspectors. There is a view that those who can, teach; and those who cannot become Ofsted inspectors or possibly—I shall say it before any colleague suggests it—Members of Parliament. Furthermore, there is a feeling that inspectors come to a school with preconceived images and agendas, based simply on mounds of statistics. It is felt also that inspectors apply a universal yardstick to all schools, with little recognition of different levels of social deprivation, or of the fact that some schools have many more pupils with special needs or behavioural difficulties than other schools in more favoured or more selective situations.

There is a perceived lack of consistency. There is a widespread impression among teachers, which my experience backs up, that too much depends on the particular team of inspectors that visits a school or, within a team, which subject inspector a teacher happens to get. Teachers can have very different experiences, depending on the approach and the personality of an individual, instead of the approach being consistent.

Above all, as I mentioned at the start, Ofsted is perceived as judgmental, not developmental. I recall working with Her Majesty's inspectors in the 1980s. When they visited a school, they quickly and perceptively diagnosed a department's strengths and weaknesses in one day. They outlined the weaknesses but, unlike Ofsted, they said, "This is how we will help you to tackle them in the forthcoming weeks and months." Ofsted descends from on high, passes judgment and disappears until the next time.

How could the chief inspector say in his evidence to the Committee that all teachers welcome inspection? Yes, teachers can argue with inspectors during the week about the judgments that they pass on them as individuals in the classroom, on the department and on the school. However, partway through the week, teachers are reluctant to do that because the inspector has to return, watch more lessons, further examine the department and write his conclusions before the end of the week. There is therefore a natural reluctance to antagonise. Teachers can complain about the report that they read at the end of the week, but it is not the final version. The inspectors will go away and write that. Again, there is a fear of rocking the boat.

When teachers complain during or after an inspection, how responsive and accountable is Ofsted? The famous Summerhill school had to spend £140,000 on an expensive court case to force Ofsted to take into account evidence from pupils and thus save the school from closure. How many state schools have the ability and the funds to do that? Comber Grove primary in Southwark had a good Ofsted inspection in 1996 and a devastating inspection in 2000.

Mike Kent, the head teacher, wrote about his experiences in an article in The Times Educational Supplement in 2000. He said:

> "By Friday, we were devastated. The team, it seemed to us, had read the documentation, noticed the previous year's SATs results were slightly down, and come in to prove we were falling apart. Older members of staff had suffered particularly. One was so distressed that by Friday she couldn't speak to me on the telephone. Younger teachers, never having experienced an Ofsted, were appalled that evaluations could be carried out in such a manner, and the governors were bewildered and angry. People who knew our school simply couldn't believe what we'd been through. At the end of the inspection, I told the registered inspector we would make a formal complaint. I was astonished by the number of letters and calls I received. Our experiences weren't unique. I replied to them all, asking one question in particular: did you complain? Just one school had. The others felt that as the nightmare was over for another four years the best plan was to forget it, pick up the pieces, and get on with the job.
> The head who'd decided to complain warned me that I was in for a long haul, with little chance of success. I'd need to complain to the contractor, then, if still dissatisfied, to Ofsted, then to the complaints adjudicator, and finally to the ombudsman . . . I began to understand why Chris Woodhead had proudly stated that schools were happy with their inspections because only 3 per cent. had ever complained."

Fourteen months later, Mike Kent had battled through a complicated complaints process, which required him to ring Ofsted time and again to inquire what was happening to the complaints and when he would receive a reply. He had to nag Ofsted constantly. At the end of that 14-month battle, more than half his complaints were upheld. However, the damage had already been done.

Ofsted inspections continue to need reforming, especially if the chief inspector believes that teachers love to see his cohorts crossing the school's threshold. The inspectors appear to be learning from some mistakes, and there are welcome comments in the report. However, do they apply the same lessons to inspecting further education colleges?

The evidence that the Association of Colleges submitted to the Select Committee conveyed great anxiety about, for example, inspections that focus on A-level and equivalent provision and give far less weight to the wide range of other work undertaken in further education. The association was worried that Ofsted inspectors did not allow for the relatively different and often lower academic ability in the intake of FE colleges, and castigated some colleges for failing to produce good enough results when compared with some other national yardstick that did not apply to them.

The association was worried about the sheer weight of the clerical work load, the burden of inspection and preparation for it; the same old complaint as that made by schools. It also complained that Ministers used the first Ofsted inspection reports to attack colleges for failing. Those attacks were based on only half a dozen early inspection reports, when the next 60 or more painted a different picture. However, we should not blame Ofsted for Ministers shooting from the hip, with their technical educational jargon of bargepoles and toilets, or at least not now that Mr. Woodhead has moved on.

I hope that Ofsted will take note not only of the Select Committee report, but of what has been said during today's debate. Ofsted might be judged to have moved from the "failing" to the "improving" category, but there is still much room for improvement.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): I want to reiterate some of the points that have been made about the improving performance and changing perception of Ofsted in recent times, due to the efforts and skill of the previous chief inspector, who recently moved on to other responsibilities. That is evidenced by the new inspection guidelines, which he produced in March 2002 and which will be implemented in September. Those guidelines will bring about a significant change in the culture and practice of Ofsted inspections.

Having said that, I have great sympathy with the comments made by the hon. Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes), who obviously speaks from the heart, as well as from his recent direct experience. We should give careful consideration to what he said, particularly about the fact that Ofsted has not traditionally been able to comment at much length about a school's context. He referred to the enormous difference between schools, in terms of their catchment areas and intake, including their proportion of statemented children and children on free school meals.

Another important factor, however, is a school's budget. Just as schools vary according to their intake, they vary according to their budget. I speak with particular feeling on this issue because the primary and secondary schools in my constituency are now, and have always been, among the worst funded in the country, entirely because of the iniquitous education standard spending assessment, which we hope will show some improvement on 1 April 2003.

In any inspection or any judgment of the quality of an institution, the budget available to that institution must be a defining factor, yet, to date, Ofsted has not been able to comment on a school's budget.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chaytor: Happily, as long as the hon. Gentleman is quick.

Mr. Brady: I do not differ from the hon. Gentleman in his aspiration for a fairer funding assessment for education authorities, which is important. Does he accept, however, that there is no direct correlation between the funding of schools and their performance? Ofsted should perhaps take an interest in that and consider the achievements of some schools that have very little.

Mr. Chaytor: No, I do not accept that there is no direct correlation, although I accept that schools with a similar level of funding vary in performance. By and large, if we compare like with like, the best funded schools are also the high achievers.

I do not want to labour the point, but criterion No. 10 of the new inspections framework, which will commence in September, relates to other specified features of a school, thereby providing an opportunity for Ofsted, if it wished and if the Government endorsed it, to make specific reference to the way in which the funding of a school impacts on its performance. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider that point.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), the Chairman of the Select Committee, who has so skilfully compiled the report. The Government's response was generally sound, with one exception: its response to the section on further education was only two lines and one word long. That is indicative of the fact that further education is the most marginalised sector of the education system. Whoever wrote the Government response—it is in the name of the new Minister for School Standards, but I do not attribute any blame to him—ought to have given a more considered response to that section of the report.

It is significant that Ofsted's response is more detailed and helpful than that of the Government. Perhaps the Select Committee report is unique in having a dual response. I pay tribute to those responsible for Ofsted's response, which I found especially constructive.

The Chairman mentioned the Select Committee's involvement in the appointment of the chief inspector. I want to endorse the importance of the role of Select Committees, and the need to extend it. We are all acutely aware of the fragility of our democracy and the fact that our Parliament is less effective on many issues than it ought to be. It does not assert itself as frequently as it ought to, and our constitution does not give it the powers of Parliaments under other constitutions.

[Mr. Chaytor]

If we review the role of Select Committee, as we have recently, it would be valuable to give them a role in the appointment process of the heads and chief executives of major Government agencies. That would invigorate our democracy and increase transparency and accountability. I ask all hon. Members present to consider that further. If in the near future we come to another report from the Modernisation Committee about the extension of the role of Select Committees, the time for that idea may eventually come.

I want to focus on Ofsted and evidence. In theory and largely in practice, the beauty and value of the inspection system is its ability to collate evidence. I want to add a question mark as to how that evidence is used, and to dwell on the selectivity of some of it. An example is provided by a section from the chief inspector's report on the performance of small sixth forms, although one could use other examples from it. Some hon. Members will know that I take a great deal of interest in that subject.

The striking feature of small sixth forms compared with larger ones—the criterion or threshold that the chief inspector's report chooses is 100 pupils—is the direct relationship between the size and the A-level point score. The chief inspector makes some extremely critical comments about the performance of small sixth forms. I simply point out that the evidence is concrete, and that it is not the first time that it has been documented. It was documented over many years, long before Ofsted existed. How are we acting on it? I do not see an enormous drive to build on the evidence provided.

Similarly, the inspector's report has a section on prison education. Members of the Committee might admit that we did not pick up on the subject. We discussed it, but we did not pick up on it specifically when preparing our report. The evidence on the subject is also pretty damning, yet what we doing about it? That was an oversight on the Committee's part; we should have given it more attention. Also, the Department should now build on the evidence and raise the profile of prison education.

In contrast, other matters on which evidence has been collected have been acted on. The classic example would be evidence on specialist schools, which was highlighted in the White Paper on schools last autumn, albeit selectively as it suggested that all specialist schools performed at a higher level than non-specialist schools, although the evidence did not quite say that. We now have a programme that is extensively promoting specialist schools.

Similarly, some areas that do not appear in the report seem to merit serious investigation. I draw attention to Question 12 on the Order Paper for today's Education and Skills Question Time; my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) asked about the performance of grammar schools in Kent. Performance in selective areas is enormously important to many hon. Members and to many thousands if not hundreds of thousands of parents, but it does not appear as evidence in the Ofsted report.

The main issue that I want to flag up is Ofsted's essential role in collecting evidence. We have to be uniform in our approach; we cannot require Ofsted to collect evidence on some things and not others. When the evidence is documented and is indisputable, we have to translate it into policy uniformly and coherently. We cannot be selective about what evidence we choose to translate into policy.

Many head teachers, teachers and parents are concerned about what happens once a critical Ofsted report has been completed. A universally glowing report is less of an issue, but if criticisms have been made, the school is left to pick up the pieces, and many teachers and head teachers feel isolated when dealing with the problems. They say, "Oh well, Ofsted inspectors came in, they told us what was wrong and they went away. We did not see them again. We were left to deal with it by ourselves." That, however, is the system. Ofsted has no role in continuing the process of school improvements once it has completed its inspection.

I question whether that is entirely satisfactory and whether Ofsted should continue to be involved if it has made a critical inspection. It comes back to the point about how we deal with critical evidence. I am not entirely sure whether we have the mechanisms in place to use that evidence to improve the school as quickly as might otherwise have been the case.

My final point builds on the question asked by the hon. Member for Chesterfield about the challenge to Ofsted by Summerhill. A document that I think was given to all members of the Select Committee—I am not familiar with the details—flags up another important issue. We are moving to a system with more diverse schools, particularly in secondary education; we are actively promoting diversity between institutions; under the Education Bill, we are giving greater autonomy to certain categories of school to develop their ethos, to opt out of the national curriculum and to vary pay and conditions. Has Ofsted kept pace with that? How will Ofsted deal with that diversity?

Summerhill is an extremely diverse school, but it presented a challenge for Ofsted because the off-the-shelf inspection package clearly did not work. I hope that the Minister and the newly appointed chief inspector will take on board the fact a bog-standard inspection method cannot deal with a diverse framework of schools.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight): I apologise to the hon. Members for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) and for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) for missing their speeches. I had an engagement that I could not miss.

It should be remembered that Ofsted is one of the great educational achievements of the Conservative party. I am pleased to recall that it was introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). I also acknowledge the action of my noble Friend Lord Patten in appointing Chris Woodhead, who was certainly the best-known chief inspector of schools. The origins of Ofsted are lost in the mists of time, but it does us no harm to remember that it is another of the achievements of the Conservative years that the current Government have taken on board.

Ofsted's role in inspecting LEAs has not had much coverage in the parts of the debate to which I have listened. I happen to work for the Grant Maintained Schools Foundation, which proposed in a report in 1997 that Ofsted should inspect LEAs. I do not know whether that had any effect on the incoming Labour Government, but it was the right way for them to go. Such inspections recognise the important role that LEAs play in supporting and, sometimes, in failing and undermining schools. I am glad that the Government have built on those Ofsted inspections. I am also pleased to have taken part in the process of out-sourcing the management of failing LEAs and building up new, more effective LEAs in several parts of the country. I hope that that will contribute significantly to the improvement of education in those areas, and that the Committee will find time to investigate failed LEAs and how they have been turned round. A range of solutions has been attempted, and some have been more successful than others. It would do no harm for us to inquire into them. I see the Minister nodding in agreement.

I echo the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds), and commend the vigorous start that Ofsted made. It was quick off the mark, sharp and quick in reporting on schools. It was a bit rough and ready, and there was too much bureaucracy and paperwork, but it was necessary to make that vigorous start if the whole range of schools across the country was to be inspected in the first four years.

I congratulate Ofsted in particular on the structure that it chose for inspecting schools. It did not employ all its inspectors itself, so it was free to employ effective inspection teams from LEAs or the private sector. That was a masterly approach to inspection, because people did not get bogged down in Ofsted's culture, as I fear they sometimes did in the culture of Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools. That meant that inspection teams that did not perform effectively in the judgment of Her Majesty's chief inspector could be sidelined with no great cost to the taxpayer.

I want briefly to consider three aspects of the report and, in particular, the Government's response to the second report. First, however, I should deal with a point made by the hon. Member for Bury, North. A great diversity of schools demands more than a bog-standard inspection process, and it is important that a school sets out its philosophy, objectives and performance indicators so that Ofsted can judge it on the basis of its success in meeting its own objectives. We must assume, or at least hope, that parents who choose Summerhill school for their children know broadly what to expect. They do not expect a traditional education, so Ofsted should not inspect the school on the basis of whether it delivers one. Such an inspection process would respond to schools' autonomy and to the demands of parents and children, which would be wholly appropriate.

I want to remark on three elements of the report, the first of which relates to LEA inspections. I understand that the Government are undertaking an independent evaluation of the new organisational models in LEAs. Will that include whether they are out-sourced, in-house or partnerships, however defined? Will there be a vigorous and detailed evaluation so as to research and publish the evidence of the success of the Government's policy, which is implemented through a number of different mechanisms?

Secondly, I should like to refer briefly to teacher recruitment and retention, on which the Government display a little complacency in their response. They repeat that their "recruitment and retention incentives strike the right balance".

Clearly they do not, because there are not enough teachers, particularly in certain shortage subjects and in certain parts of the south-east of England. I am glad that the Government are contemplating putting more resources into areas where the cost of living is high, but I ask the Minister also to consider areas such as my constituency, where recruitment difficulties arise for entirely different reasons.

The head teacher of a primary school is quite likely to have a spouse who is in the same or a similar public sector profession. If someone is unlucky enough to live in Southampton and is the head teacher of a primary school, their spouse can look for a job anywhere from Brighton to Woking, from Oxford to Axminster. If they live on the Isle of Wight, the area in which their spouse can look for a job is much reduced, so there are far fewer women in work on the Isle of Wight than in almost any other part of the country. That is a significant recruitment problem, not only in education, but for the medical profession and the private sector professions.

Mr. Chaytor: The hon. Gentleman said that there are fewer women in work on the Isle of Wight than almost anywhere else in the country. Is there not therefore a significant pool of labour from which to recruit into the public services on the Isle of Wight?

Mr. Turner: There is a significant pool of labour that can be recruited to the less skilled end of public service employment. However, my primary schools find it hard to recruit head teachers, my hospital finds it hard to recruit doctors and my local authority finds it hard to recruit the more senior professionals because there is no job for the wife or husband to go to within easy travelling distance. I hope that the Minister will address that matter.

Finally, there is the issue of pupil behaviour and attendance. The real problem is whether the head and governors of a school can take effective action to deal with pupils who do not or will not attend, or who will not behave when they do attend. I appreciate what the Government are trying to do to roll back the difficulties caused by the fact that for many years people in authority, particularly authority over children, have been undermined. However, that does not require a range of micro-management activities. Members, the Government and as many people as possible should express their confidence in those in authority, even when they occasionally get it wrong. The range of appeal systems does not express that confidence. Indeed, it expresses the opposite. It encourages parents to appeal against an exclusion, to complain and to believe that they and their children have rights to the exclusion of the rights of others.

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

5.13 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Turner: I think that all my points have been made.

5.14 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am grateful for being called, and shall be rapid and try to keep to my allotted two minutes. I was going to praise the Chairman of the Education and Skills Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), but I managed to miss his erudite comments and, as he is not here now, I do not have to praise him. Therefore, I shall move even more quickly.

I shall refer briefly to value for money, and to the appendix to the memorandum from Professor Carol Fitz-Gibbon. I do not necessarily agree that there should be a royal commission. However, we should consider value for money, especially with regard to those being inspected. The point is worthy of mention—if other hon. Members referred to it earlier and I missed it, I apologise.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) referred to the inclusion of further education in the Ofsted regime. The vast majority of colleges are now inspected under that regime. Although that fact does not get much of a headline, it is worthy of note. It is early days, so it is difficult to gain an understanding of the importance and the impact of that, but we can comment on what the Committee said and also on the evidence, especially from the Association of Colleges. The jury is still out, but there must be some recognition of matters that cause concern, on which the Minister may wish to comment, although not necessarily today.

We must ask who is doing the inspecting and whether they have the appropriate depth of knowledge of further education. We recognise the need to see how FE works and to examine its learning strategies, but because the FE strand goes well beyond the 16-to-19 range, it must be considered sensitively. What is happening outside the modus operandi of the inspection must be included, otherwise an unreal impression will be gained of what a college is about.

It is fair to say that dialogue is needed between the Department and the AOC, and I understand that that is to take place. There is recent evidence that colleges are improving, and they are to be congratulated. If we do not get the process right, we know the damage that it will do, as it did to schools. We do not want to go through that process again with FE, in which people feel that the inspection is not a fair reflection of the work that they do and what the college is really capable of.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): I thank hon. Members for being brief, which has given us half an hour for the three main winding-up speeches.

5.16 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): I shall take my customary brief 10 minutes.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): I see there are no lawyers present.

Mr. Willis: I shall ignore that remark, Mr. Olner.

It is good to have a debate on a Select Committee report about which there is no real contention. People accept that it is a good report, and I compliment the Committee and its Chairman, the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), in his absence—please do not tell him—on the way in which the report was prepared. I put on record my party's thanks to Mike Tomlinson, who did a remarkable job in turning Ofsted round. We wish David Bell well as he commences his work.

There were some interesting contributions from hon. Members, but I shall not go through them one by one as time does not allow that. However, I pick out the comments of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on Ofsted's inspection of further education. I think we have got it wrong; there is a basic flaw in the way in which the Learning and Skills Act 2000 set up the post-16 inspection. I urge the Chairman of the Select Committee and the Minister to reconsider that issue. It is important to examine what Ofsted and the Adult Learning Inspectorate are doing and to get inspection right.

FE continues to be marginalised in the comments that come out of the mouths of Ministers. That is to be regretted, and ultimately we will suffer as a result. The FE sector has done a remarkable job, especially since incorporation, and we should celebrate it.

There has been much talk about the royal commission and research. I agree with the Select Committee Chairman, who said that a royal commission is not necessarily needed. When it reviews its work next year, the Select Committee and the Government must ask how Ofsted knows that its conclusions are correct. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have referred to occasions when lives have been devastated and schools blighted as a result of Ofsted's work. If that is the case, we must know that its conclusions are right.

I have one question for the Minister, which he can either pick up later or put into his thought bank. Government policy and Ofsted are closely linked: in effect, Ofsted inspects the Government's policy. The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) commented on that. Few hon. Members would disagree with the view that the Government have done a good job in focusing on literacy and numeracy in primary schools, and my party would be the first to say that. However, are standards improving in primary schools because of the Government's strategies or because children, with their teachers' aid, are getting better at passing the tests? When I visit schools around the country—which I am sure the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) does, too—regrettably I see children being endlessly prepared for their SATs. That may well bring improvement in the outcomes of SATs, but does it improve the education system? That question must be answered.

Like several hon. Members, I want to talk about moving on from where we are now to where we want to be. I regretted the way in which Ofsted was introduced and felt bitterly about it as a head teacher, but my school's inspection in 1997 was one of the most fruitful experiences that my staff and I went through. I have put that on record many times. That was partly because of the registered inspector, Champac Shan, who was absolutely brilliant in informing, advising, bringing people together and listening to their complaints.

That inspector later left Ofsted because he was not allowed to work as a registered inspector in the way that he wanted. He was probably what I would describe as too developmental and should have been more judgmental, but we should move towards being more developmental. Most schools have got the message—if they have not, something has gone badly wrong—and we now need a different approach. That point was made earlier by the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds), and there were a few guffaws around the Chamber, which was a pity because he has a point.

Whether we want a lighter touch is not my point, and I want to leave the Minister with one thought. In the models for improving practice and achieving best practice in the private sector—not the one-size-fits-all practice, the virtues of which the hon. Member for Huddersfield was extolling—the idea of total quality management is very exciting. The Minister should examine what is happening in Londonderry, where two schools have adopted the process of total quality management. They are continually looking for small incremental improvements rather than quantum leaps, which is what Ofsted wanted in the early days. When a system is put in place that enables the organisation to improve bit by bit, the sum of those parts gives an immense feeling of satisfaction. I commend that to the Minister.

The hon. Member for Bury, North was right to comment on the changes that are occurring. We support some of the principles behind the Education Bill, which is due back from the Lords soon. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West and I supported the principle of innovation and autonomy, but if we want real innovation and autonomy, we cannot have one-size-fits-all inspection or examination systems. Whether the Conservatives want to get rid of AS-levels or we want to get rid of GCSEs is not the point. The point is that schools must be encouraged to develop their own curriculum and ways of working that make them exciting institutions. I want schools in Altrincham and Sale to adopt the international baccalaureate—or perhaps a north-west baccalaureate. I want schools to begin their AS-level work with pupils at the age of 15 rather than 16. Those changes are all possible, but not under the current regime, because Ofsted must report in a certain framework.

My last point is on special educational needs. I regret to inform the hon. Member for Huddersfield that, as far as Ofsted is concerned, special educational needs are a tag-on in schools and in further education. I compliment the Government: they have done a great deal to raise the profile of special education, as did the previous Government. The Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001—the new code of practice which we fought hard to get through and which the Government supported—and the amendments that were tabled have enabled us to make progress in leaps and bounds. However, we have a one-size-fits-all inspection system that does not recognise what is happening in the world of special needs. We have developed inclusion in most schools, and that has been a roaring success. Of course, sometimes it has not worked. Large groups of youngsters with hearing and sight impairments and severe learning difficulties enrich the school, but also skew it. Ofsted still reports on such schools irrespective of whether they have such kids. The Government and the Select Committee must be more rigorous in deciding what they want Ofsted to do. Ofsted is a good developmental tool, but it needs to move on.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Even in a commendably brief contribution, the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) managed to raise the prospect of separate examinations for Altrinham and Sale, and even a north-west baccalaureate, which may be what the AS-level will become. The Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), must shortly leave for another engagement, and was kind enough to apologise. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman and the Select Committee on their report, and on the hon. Gentleman's genuine commitment and determination to continue scrutinising the activities of the Government and Ofsted. I hope that he will forgive me if I note that the two Chairmen who preceded him were demoted from that position to the Government Front Bench. I hope that he will take it in good part if I say that I hope that the same will not happen to him. It is essential that the Select Committee and its Chairman focus on the scrutiny of the Department for Education and Skills, and that no other goals cloud their judgment.

In his introduction, the hon. Member for Huddersfield talked about the extent to which Ofsted has grown and developed in its work, and how much more important it is that Parliament scrutinises its work, not least from the perspective of looking after public money. As he rightly said, that is our core function. He also talked about the potential role of the Select Committee and the appointment of the chief inspector of schools. He made a compelling point when he asked why we should have Ofsted if it did not drive up standards. He was probably far from alone in the Chamber in finding in favour of Ofsted in that regard. Members on both sides have been clear that Ofsted has been a positive force overall, although there are different shades of opinion on how that work has been done at different times.

I was also pleased that the hon. Member for Huddersfield praised Chris Woodhead for his work while he was at Ofsted. As several hon. Members said, it is important to find the right balance between toughness and rigour on the one hand, and encouragement and the developmental role on the other. I am tempted to observe that perhaps Chris Woodhead was ahead of the current Secretary of State with her bargepole and Alastair Campbell with his bog standard schools in seeking to give encouragement and urge a more developmental approach.

[Mr. Graham Brady]

My hon. Friend the Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) spoke about the importance of light-touch inspection. That is absolutely right. The situation of a school that is known to be good and doing its job properly is very different from that of a school that needs more intervention and assistance to improve standards. He also spoke about the importance of the rigorous start that Ofsted had made, and that point was picked up by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner). My hon. Friend the Member for Boston and Skegness praised the introduction of unannounced inspections. Again, that is positive. Much of the criticism that one hears in schools about the inspection process is about the work that goes into preparing for the inspection, rather than the inspection itself.

I was fortunate on Monday evening to be presenting prizes at Wellington school in my constituency. That local high school is a technology college and is doing fabulous things. The school recently underwent an Ofsted inspection, and the head said that when he heard that it was about to be inspected, he called the staff together and told them that they should look forward to it. He was right, at least about looking forward to the inspection's outcome, because the work of the school was found to be excellent. That is how schools should address inspection. A good school that focuses on raising standards and improving the education of all its pupils has nothing to fear from an Ofsted inspection, and frequently much to gain.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Ms Munn), in a very long speech—that was not entirely her fault—spoke about league tables and the inspection of child care, which are important issues. We must acknowledge that when considering league tables and the difficulties that might arise for schools that become known for specialising in children with special educational needs or in particular types of education. We must seriously consider publishing alongside existing league tables value-added information, which could address some of those concerns. Problems have arisen with the inspection of child care. In the introductory stages, there appear in some places to be significant delays in registration, and there are problems with the bureaucracy involved in processing paperwork. That must be addressed.

In the short time available, I cannot comment on all the speeches and interventions that have been made, but I always enjoy listening to the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), partly because I disagree with almost everything that he says. We must thrash out the interesting question of how schools use money and where value for money is being delivered. There is strong evidence that there is no direct correlation between the amount of money spent and the attainment of schools. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the record of his response to my intervention, he will see that he was not far from agreeing with me when he said that there was a huge divergence in performance between schools to which similar resources were devoted.

It is important that we focus on how we can derive the best value for money in the delivery of education, and how we can spread best practice and ensure that all schools do the best that they can with the available resources. At the same time, I agreed with the hon. Gentleman on the importance of a fairer distribution of resources throughout the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight spoke about the great Conservative achievement of the introduction of Ofsted. In the consensual spirit of the debate, I am glad that he did so in the way that he did, because he drew attention to the areas of agreement between the Opposition and the Government. We welcome the fact that the Government have accepted the important role of Ofsted in inspecting schools and helping to raise standards. We also welcome their acceptance of our belief in increased specialism in schools, and in allowing a degree of selection in schools for that purpose. I think that Ministers' opinions in that respect differ somewhat from those of the hon. Member for Bury, North. However, I shall leave it to the Minister to deal with that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight spoke compellingly of the realities of inspecting a diverse range of schools. The Government are taking measures in the Education Bill to allow a greater diversity of schools across the country. We welcome that, but it will be a challenge to ensure that the right form of inspection takes place.

I should like to say something about this week's report from Ofsted and the Government's reaction to it. Ofsted's criticism of the performance of schools and of teachers at key stage three contradicts its earlier findings that at key stage three the measure of good teaching amounted to 75 per cent. but only 72 per cent. at key stage two. It seems slightly contradictory to suggest that the weakness comes in key stage three and that all problems are resolved at an earlier stage.

Ofsted must be rigorous, independent of the Government and prepared to speak out in support of standards, even when that is unpopular. I wish the Select Committee and its Chairman well in their future work in helping to hold Ofsted to account, and I am sure that it will fulfil that important function to the best of its ability.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): We have had an excellent, if somewhat interrupted, debate. I thank everyone who has taken part, and also one or two colleagues who have not taken part out of respect for the time constraints. I undertook to give the Committee the apologies of the Chairman of the Select Committee on Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who could not be here for the winding-up speeches as he had to fulfil a prior engagement.

On behalf of the Department for Education and Skills, I congratulate the Select Committee on securing this important debate on Ofsted and on the work that it has done. The Select Committee's reports are a very valuable input into the continuing work of ensuring that inspection is of a high quality and makes a significant contribution to the vital work of improving quality and raising standards at local and national level. As a number of colleagues have said, Ofsted is a slightly unusual organisation. It is an inspectorate, enjoying independence in matters of professional judgment, as well as a non-ministerial Government Department. That is why the Select Committee is so important as a mechanism for ensuring Ofsted's accountability to Parliament.

I apologise to hon. Members if I do not respond to all the specific points raised during the debate, but I shall try to address some of them. The role that the Select Committee plays in the appointment of Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools has been discussed before. I take the point that my hon. Friend made about the composition of the selection panel. As we have a new chief inspector, David Bell, it is not a matter of priority to address the procedures for this appointment. However, the Government take seriously the points that the Select Committee has made, and we will consider them carefully at the appropriate time. My hon. Friend was right to place this in the context of a broader debate about the modernisation of Parliament and the strengthening of Parliament as an institution. It would be helpful if comments from this Select Committee were fed into other Select Committees, including the Modernisation Committee. Although there is no commitment to change, there is certainly an openness and readiness to reconsider this matter in the months and years ahead.

I am aware from the debate and the reports that the Select Committee endorses the widely held belief in the value of external inspection. Inspection is now accepted as a valuable part of education, as is Ofsted, even by Members who criticised some of its practices, particularly the early practice. Much has happened in the 18 months since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who was then the Minister of State, addressed the previous debate on Ofsted in Westminster Hall. She began by paying a warm tribute to the many people in schools throughout the country whose efforts have contributed to the very good results achieved in most schools. We have seen further improvements, and they are borne out in the reports that we are debating today.

It has been widely accepted by hon. Members that it was right to give priority to the literacy and numeracy strategies in primary schools. Although we must be careful about over-testing and the burden of tests and examinations, I have no doubt from reading the reports, reviewing the evidence and visiting schools that we have seen a real improvement in literacy and numeracy standards among our primary school children. We should all pay tribute to the teachers and others who have ensured that that has happened.

There is also much to celebrate in our secondary schools. Last year they achieved the national target of 50 per cent. of pupils reaching school-leaving age gaining five good GSCEs. That is a real advance, which was achieved a year earlier than the Government's target. There are improvements in the position of our young people compared with those in other countries in tests in science, literacy and maths. A great deal more still needs to be done. Standards are rising but they are not as good across the board as they should be. The gap between the best and the worst performing schools remains too wide.

The reports from Ofsted make it clear that standards rise when schools are well led and when there is good teaching. Ofsted has told us that the standard of leadership and teaching in our schools has continued to improve. Indeed, the quality of teaching is now at an all-time high. Not only has the long tail of unsatisfactory teaching shrunk year after year, which few believed possible, but the proportion of good and very good teaching has risen.

Ofsted has a central role in our strategy for raising standards. Its role has been enhanced, which has meant a period of organisational change as a result of two significant extensions to its remit. Those are the addition of 16-to-19 education in colleges, where Ofsted works in partnership with the Adult Learning Inspectorate, and the regulation of child care. It is timely to pay tribute, as hon. Members have done, to the work of Mike Tomlinson, who stepped into the role of chief inspector at short notice in December 2000, and to welcome in his place David Bell, whose five-year appointment began on 1 May.

We have seen considerable improvements in the school inspection system over recent years, which are borne out in the debate and in the reports. Of course there is always scope for further improvement, for more flexibility and for learning lessons as we go along. We have had some important contributions to the debate about how inspection can be improved. Inspection should be challenging, but it should also be the positive, constructive experience that the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) described from his school visit earlier this week. We also want Ofsted's approach to be more responsive to schools' individual circumstances, to make more use of the findings of schools' self-evaluation, to take more account of the views of parents, pupils and other stakeholders and to be better co-ordinated with other inspection and monitoring. We want to involve schools more in what we are doing in a genuine sense of partnership.

This year, as a number of hon. Members have pointed out, has also seen the start of the second cycle of inspections of LEAs, which Ofsted is conducting with the assistance of the Audit Commission. New arrangements for inspecting local authority education services are being developed in the context of the comprehensive performance assessment. Those will build on the proportionate inspection process already implemented by Ofsted since the beginning of this year, and will deliver even more streamlined arrangements. It is important that these new processes are a success.

In the remaining two minutes, I should like to respond to one or two of the specific points that have been raised. The new role with FE is important, and it is vital to get it right. I regret that only two lines about FE appear in our response to the report, because it must be at the heart of our strategy for widening participation in education, particularly after the age of 16. FE is also vital for the 14-to-19 curriculum and for tackling some of the behavioural problems to which hon. Members referred.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) asked about recruitment and retention in his constituency. I shall ask his local authority to write to the Department about that matter, and I shall chase it up for him.

[Mr. Stephen Twigg]

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) asked about prison education. We have seen some improvement in prisons and other offender institutions, but it is only a start and much more needs to be done. My hon. Friend's neighbour, the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), has taken on that responsibility, which he takes seriously. We all want to see further advances made.

Recruitment and retention is a challenge across the country, especially in high-cost areas. Earlier this week, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State issued the London challenge. We are developing a strategy for schools in London and, together with my right hon. Friend, I take responsibility for it. We recognise that some of the problems London faces with recruitment and retention are shared in other high-cost areas. We must take that into account as we debate the funding of local education authorities.

I apologise for not being able, in my 10 minutes, to refer to all the issues raised in the debate. However, we have had a positive and constructive discussion, and I look forward to future debates about Ofsted and the Select Committee's work in ensuring that both Ofsted and the Department are accountable.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fourteen minutes to Six o'clock.

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Refrigerators

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Kemp.]

9.30 am

Angela Watkinson (Upminster): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the effects of the European Commission's regulation on the safe disposal of waste freezers and refrigerators. It has affected industrial and commercial appliances since October last year, but has also applied to domestic appliances since 1 January this year. Before I highlight the practical problems being experienced by local authorities in implementing the new duties, I will outline the background to the regulation.

The possibility of damage to the ozone layer from chlorofluorocarbons—that is the last time I will say that word in full—was predicted in 1974. In 1985, the Vienna convention for the protection of the ozone layer was framed to promote precautionary action. In 1997, an international agreement was reached to reduce progressively the use of CFCs and halos—the Montreal protocol to the Vienna convention. That has now been ratified by 156 countries, including all industrialised nations. Recent reports that the United Kingdom faces a growing pile of old refrigerators is perhaps the first obvious impact of the Montreal protocol. In 1999, the United Kingdom agreed to a European directive that would require all CFCs from refrigerators to be recycled from 1 January 2002.

In July 2001, it was brought to the attention of the United Kingdom Government that the directive would also cover insulating foam in the doors and walls of refrigerators. The Government have complained about the late timing of the information passed on by the European Union, but the 1 January deadline caught them unaware. The Minister stated that he did not believe there was a precedent for a delay in the implementation of the directive when the matter had already gone through Brussels. Unfortunately, the Government did not even ask for a delay in the implementation of such a worthy directive. A delay or phased implementation would have eased the many problems now being faced by waste collection and disposal authorities. Sites could have been identified for the recycling of refrigerators and other electrical goods.

The habit of refitting the kitchens of homes when they exchange hands means that many redundant refrigerators are still serviceable and in good condition. If they could be reused, the numbers requiring degassing and disposal, either by high temperature incineration or to landfill, would be reduced. In response to a parliamentary question, the Minister said that up to 3 million domestic refrigeration units are disposed of in the United Kingdom each year. A large number of them seem to be in my constituency.

Old refrigerators must be treated in one of three ways. The whole refrigerator may be disposed of in an incinerator. That process is expensive, and means that the metal elements of the refrigerator cannot be recycled. It has also been suggested that they can be disposed of abroad. However, refrigerators are now classified as hazardous waste, and thus cannot be exported. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will be kind enough to clarify that point when he sums up. Moreover, transport costs are very high. The best available option is that proposed by the Government: that refrigerators be disposed of in purpose-built reclamation facilities in the United Kingdom. However, the Government do not seem to have made provision for that most sensible means of disposal. Although the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has allocated £6 million to help local authorities deal with the storage costs of the refrigerators that they cannot dispose of, none of that sum is payable until the next financial year.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): My hon. Friend has rightly alluded to the length of time that it took for the Government to wake up to such matters. Is she aware that the Minister received a letter dated 24 November 2000 from Dixons Group plc that alerted the Government to the ending of both the company's free take-back scheme and the export potential of those refrigerators, and to the consequences? The Government did not react to that timely warning.

Angela Watkinson: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his helpful intervention. I have received many letters from retailers about that very point. The potential exists for the retailer take-back method, which offers opportunities for refurbishment and resale, to take 20 per cent. of waste refrigerators from the waste stream. It is a great pity that that method is not available to the retail trade.

Mr. Jack: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene again. She may have noticed that, when I gave her that piece of information, the Minister intimated that he vigorously disagreed. In his reply to the letter that I mentioned, Lord Whitty says:

> "A number of questions have arisen during the implementation of Article 11 and we are addressing these problems as a matter of urgency."

Is my hon. Friend aware that we learned that refrigerator mountains were beginning to build up in December 2001, yet that letter was written a year earlier? Does she consider that to be a demonstration of urgency of action by the Government?

Angela Watkinson: My right hon. Friend is right, of course. Another problem is that additional costs are piling up on local authorities, which have a duty to collect redundant refrigerators if retailers do not take them back.

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Michael Meacher): I intend to respond vigorously to all those points when I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Of course we received that letter in September 2000, but I vigorously indicated my dissent because we did not need to be warned by Dixons, as I made perfectly clear to the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee. We were the first to raise the issue with the Commission in February 1999, about 20 months earlier. We took the initiative: we did not need any warning from retailers. The problem was that the Commission did not answer the perfectly proper question that we asked.

Angela Watkinson: Let me give an example. Essex county council has estimated that its costs are expected to be in the region of £1.68 million. So far, its predicted share of the £6 million sum is likely to be in the region of £50,000. The shortfall will have to be found from council tax, at a time when the difference between central Government grant and the spending requirements of local authorities is widening annually at an alarming rate. On the other hand, the East London waste authority, which services my constituency, has yet to learn how much funding it might be given. Havering council accepts and collects, via its bulky refuse collection service, only domestic refrigerators and freezers, which are temporarily stored at a local civic amenity site. Neither Havering nor any of the other ELWA constituent authorities accommodates commercial refrigerators and freezers. Between November and July—a period of only seven months—Havering had almost 5,000 refrigerators and freezers weighing 204 tonnes collected from its civic amenity site by ELWA collection vehicles, which required 153 vehicle movements.

A recent ELWA report highlighted the scope of the problem when it revealed the expectation that the authority would receive between 7,000 and 40,000 units. The speculative nature of the numbers involved illustrates one of the difficulties in planning that service. As the containers have to be stacked for onward shipment to Germany, closed-top containers must be used to meet health and safety and licensing requirements. A short-term contract was let, which allowed the disposal of approximately 5,500 units. However, the report pointed out that ELWA was receiving 574 units a week and that, by the end of June, more than 10,500 units would be stored at its refuse transfer station.

The report went on to identify options and associated costs for the disposal of refrigerators. The option chosen by the board of ELWA was the disposal of all units within the current financial year. That would have the advantage of clearing the RTS site as quickly as possible, and there would be no burden on future years' expenditure.

The total estimated cost for 2002–03, including storage and disposal, is between £750,000 and £1 million. Havering alone, one of ELWA's four constituent authorities, has roughly 95,000 properties. It can expect between 9,500 and 19,000 units a year, depending on the life of a refrigerator; the figures are based on a lifespan of five to 10 years. The council has to offer a free collection service to deter fly tipping, and that is an additional burden on its budget.

The guidance that outlines the legislative requirements for the collection and disposal of refrigerators is highly prescriptive. It imposes many new duties for which authorities are unprepared in both practical and financial terms. The standard that practitioners should achieve is an ozone-depleting substance loss of 15 to 25g per unit, which can be achieved by using a fully automated mechanical recovery plant with an integrated degassing unit. It is anticipated that losses in that range would certainly be acceptable from a Montreal protocol perspective.

The following requirements in the guidance involve techniques that prospective practitioners may not have anticipated: the removal of ozone-depleting substances prior to the storage of the appliance; extraction of both the oil and refrigerant in the same step; and, possibly, the pre-heating of appliances prior to degassing. Best practice would also involve degassing in a controlled environment where fugitive releases of ODS could be recovered. In the interim, the pragmatic decision has been taken that degassing can take place in the open air. Although degassing outside a controlled environment introduces an additional uncertainty regarding the overall ODS recovery efficiency from cradle to grave, it is currently considered acceptable, given the unquantified loss of ODS from handling and transport operations.

The standard licence is for the pre-destruction and storage of refrigeration equipment, including refrigerators. The conditions require the removal of foodstuffs and loose materials, cleaning, and the removal or securing of doors before the refrigerator is put into storage. That is defined as pre-treatment. The storage prior to pre-treatment, and the pre-treatment operation itself, must be undertaken on an impermeable surface. Once the pre-treatment has been done, the refrigerator can be removed to hard-standing for short-term storage of less than 12 months.

If refrigerators are stored for more than 12 months, the compressor must be drained of refrigerant and lubricating oil, and that draining operation must be done on an impermeable surface. The standard licence is to be used for the pre-destruction treatment and storage of waste refrigeration equipment only, and is not to be issued without modification in flood-risk areas.

The uncertainty about the long-term funding of that highly complex service makes it very difficult for disposal authorities to commit to long-term contracts. That is slowing down the process, and is resulting in a greater backlog than is necessary. The most immediate need is for a fast, non-bureaucratic reimbursement system, backed up by documentation, so that local authorities can forward plan with confidence. They need to be able to expand their local civic amenity sites where electrical goods can be brought for recycling, to provide proper storage facilities, and to form partnerships with refurbishing organisations such as Renew Trust.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): Is my hon. Friend aware that some time ago, in answer to a question of mine, the Minister said that the Government would fund any new duty imposed on a local authority? Is she aware of whether the Government have quantified how much they expect to pay local authorities, and whether they have offered funds to those local authorities to help them to prepare for what will undoubtedly be an environmental catastrophe?

Angela Watkinson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, because the main thrust of the debate is that local authorities are unprepared, both financially and in practical terms, to deal with those expensive new duties. The £6 million that has been promised will be spread thinly over local authorities across the country, and that will leave an enormous shortfall that local authorities will have to make up out of their council tax.

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend mentioned the thinness of resource for local authorities to store refrigerators and the fact that the Minister estimates that the cost of disposing of the existing mound of refrigerators will be some £40 million. The trade suggests that it could be as high as £60 million to £70 million. It remains unclear who will pay for the disposal of those refrigerators, let alone what will happen in future.

Angela Watkinson: My right hon. Friend is right. Security of funding is necessary for all authorities that deal with the storage or disposal of fridges, to enable them to enter into long-term contracts. Until they can do that, there will be no lessening in impact of either the existing fridge mountain or the one gathering as fridges continue to flow into civic amenity sites throughout the country.

Renew Trust is typical of a refurbishment company that specialises in taking in redundant fridges for resale to housing associations and social services. I understand that legislation to reinstate retailer take-back is not expected before 2004. Interim measures to enable the service to be reinstated before then would greatly benefit that sector of the waste management industry. That would also prepare for the waste electrical and electronic equipment directive, which is wending its way through the European Parliament and will introduce new measures to reuse, recycle and recover all electrical and electronic equipment in order to reduce their disposal to landfill.

The lessons from the fridge disposal debacle need to be learned. The cost impact of the WEEE waste electrical and electronic equipment directive on both large and small businesses as well as waste collection and disposal authorities needs to be assessed. The last thing we want is a computer mountain that makes the fridge mountain look like a molehill.

9.47 am

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson), who spoke properly and strongly about the problems affecting her area. It is a national problem. Between 2.5 million and 3 million fridges are discarded each year. According to the Minister, the cost of the episode is £40 million, although informed estimates from the private sector suggest that it could be much more—about £60 million to £70 million.

It is important to look at the landscape. Over the weekend, I visited Burntsump waste disposal site in north Nottinghamshire to see the piles of refrigerators. It will clearly take some time to resolve the problem.

The episode has not reflected well on any of the parties involved. Following press speculation and the Select Committee report, it is important to draw lessons for the future. In introducing the new regulation, it is important in environmental terms to achieve more than we have so far.

The Select Committee report refers to the regulation being rushed through Parliament at a breakneck speed. It took three weeks for Parliament to consider that important matter. I appreciate that that is a matter not for the Minister but for the House and the appropriate Committee, but we need to look carefully at how we deal with the increasing amount of European Union legislation on the environment in particular.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. What emerged from consultation on fridges and end of life vehicles is that negotiations with the EU seem to be led by the Department of Trade and Industry. However, the Department with responsibility for implementation and enforcement is the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which was not party to the process, and was not fully informed about what was agreed. Is not that an obvious lacuna, and an example of a total lack of joined-up government?

Paddy Tipping: One of the things that emerges from this episode is that several Departments were involved, such as the DTI and the forerunner of DEFRA. When discussions took place at the management committee in Brussels, it was not always clear which official and Department was taking the lead in the negotiations. However, it is significant that when the British Government, and Governments across the EU, signed up to this regulation, they did not have a clue about what they were signing up to.

Malcolm Bruce: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there was pressure to reach political agreement before the details of the ozone-depleting substance regulation and subsequent European environmental legislation were sorted out, and that, in retrospect, that has turned out to be the Achilles heel of this approach to environmental legislation?

Paddy Tipping: That is absolutely right. One of the lessons that we can learn from this regulation is that it is necessary to involve politicians at an early stage, when things appear to be going wrong. There was a protracted discussion between the Minister's Department and officials in Brussels—I know that the Minister will tell us about that—and I believe that there were faults on both sides. However, when the Minister became directly involved in July 2001, things began to happen. I make no complaint about the way that officials worked, but it is clear that things were going badly wrong. There had been a series of discussions to try to resolve the matter, but when the Minister became involved, progress began to be made. When difficulties of this kind arise, the Council of Ministers ought to be brought back into the discussion.

Mr. Sayeed: If I heard the hon. Gentleman correctly, he suggested that other EU countries were no more ready than the UK. Is he aware that, as of October 2000, four other EU member states were fully prepared to deal with this problem?

Paddy Tipping: There is a mixed response across the EU. Some countries, such as Germany and the Scandinavian nations, were well prepared. However, some EU countries have not made the progress that the British Government have made—and we have still got problems.

I return to my point. A political agreement was reached. A technical discussion then took place about the way that the regulation was going to be introduced. Problems arose, and at the end of the day—three years after the initial discussion of the regulation—we have environmental problems, because there was a lack of proper planning in this country, and across the EU.

Two lessons must be learned from that process, and talked about further. The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) talked about the private sector. Companies such as Comet had spotted that there was a problem, and it tried to tell the Department about it. It might not have been pitching at the right level in the Department, but it is clear that the private sector perceived that there was going to be a problem. That lead them to withdraw the take-back scheme. Their messages should have been picked up sooner. We must also have a better and more thorough discussion about the technical nature of the problems as such regulations are introduced.

Therefore, the process of introducing the regulations is difficult, and it should be improved. I take on board the point that it is important to get this right now, because there is a great amount of European legislation that will have an impact on this country. The landfill directive will change radically, and for the better, the way that waste is disposed of in the UK. The hon. Member for Upminster mentioned the end of life vehicle directive and the WEEE directive, both of which are sitting on the Minister's desk. They present major challenges for the Government. I would like to say—and I hope that the Minister will reassure me—that we are better prepared for the introduction of that legislation, but I am slightly ambivalent about that.

With regard to the end of life vehicle directive, a decision was taken only a few weeks ago that the last owner should pay for the disposal of the vehicle. That will lead to real difficulties. I know that steps and measures have been taken to try to mitigate them, but, potentially, the problem of abandoned cars and vehicles will become another real issue for the Government. It could be the end of the road for good quality waste disposal governed by DEFRA. Similarly, the WEEE directive affecting electrical equipment great deal of potential to cause problems.

The hon. Member for Upminster mentioned the costs to local authorities. On balance, the points that she made were pretty fair. Let us examine what has taken place so far: £6 million was made available to local authorities in 2001-02 for storage costs in the first three months of this calendar year. That money has been paid to local authorities via the standard spending assessment, through the distribution mechanism. However, when one asks local authorities, "How much money are you getting to store refrigerators?", they do not know, because it is drip fed throughout the year.

I have tabled parliamentary questions asking the Minister to specify how much money has been paid to each local authority in 2001–02. I am concerned that, after pressing this matter for some time, we still do not have that breakdown in black and white. In the light of those comments, I am sure that the Minister will examine the matter and respond quickly.

The hon. Lady quite properly asked about the real costs for the current financial year. Three months into this financial year, no announcement has yet been made. We must have an announcement at an early date so that local authorities know where they stand. At the end of the day, if their costs are not reimbursed—and I doubt that they will be—they will knock on to the local council tax payer.

We need some indication from the Minister in the near future about the way forward, which, in a sense, should be to go back to what we had before. Companies such as Comet that provide new fridges should have a take-back scheme. When we refit our kitchens and buy new equipment, it makes obvious sense to have someone take the old equipment away. I would like to see a take-back scheme introduced quickly. I know that there have been discussions between the interested parties about that, and, in March, the Department issued a potential protocol for the way forward. My impression is that all the stakeholders are keen to take that forward.

Mr. Sayeed: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, in last Sunday's "Captain Cash" column in the News of the World, the Minister said that he was ready to > "announce the return of the take-back service."

The Minister added—and I hope that this is an accurate quote:

> "I hope that we get it in place within a few weeks, but certainly in the next couple of months".

In the discussions that he has had with retailers, will the Minister tell us where they will restore, refurbish or recycle the refrigerators?

Paddy Tipping: Retailers, including Comet, run schemes throughout the country. White goods are taken and refurbished. The scheme has the potential to offer refurbished goods to families with limited incomes, and alongside that is the opportunity to train people with employment problems due to such things as long-term employment or disability. We should focus on such a scheme because it is the way forward.

Unfortunately, I did not have the opportunity to read the "Captain Cash" column in the News of the World on Sunday. I look at only the front page of that paper to ensure that my name is not there; I never look at the inside pages. I shall peruse the "Captain Cash" column very diligently.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion): The Western Mail might not have reached Sherwood yet, but if the hon. Gentleman had read it today, he would have seen a picture of Europe's largest fridge dump of 35,000 refrigerators at Newport dock. The story in the paper is more encouraging because it mentions the opening of the United Kingdom's first fridge and freezer recycling facility. If we work with such facilities, and distribution companies, manufacturers and sellers of the products, the recycling circle will be finished. The key to success will be not only the useful additional recycling for less well off families that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but the 35,000 fridges in Newport that will be processed there by a new facility.

Paddy Tipping: The hon. Gentleman has raised an important point that leads me to the final points that I wish to make.

The Government are consulting on a protocol on a way forward: the notion of fridge recycling credit. It would help all parties involved to be told by the Minister today whether that scheme will be introduced within three or four weeks, or whether it will take longer.

Angela Watkinson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the additional benefit of the retailer take-back scheme is the fact that as refrigerators are carefully collected, stored and transported, and kept upright, it is more possible to refurbish and resell them? Refrigerators that come via local authority collections are not stored and transported carefully, and I understand that only about 1 per cent. have the potential to be reused.

Paddy Tipping: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. The Minister has direct experience of that because the storage mountain for his region is close to his constituency. There has been controversy about the way in which refrigerators have been stored there. If fridges are stored properly and stacked correctly, there is a much better chance of recycling and reusing them.

I turn to the point that was raised by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas). There has been much investment in Wales, and there will be much investment throughout the country. The real lesson from the story is that the United Kingdom Government have a good record on environmental matters. We have an emerging environmental industry and emerging environmental technologies. With good leadership and forethought about legislation, that technology can be developed and investment can be made. We can not only enhance the environment, but build a new environmental technology industry that can be the envy of Europe.

10.3 am

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion): I congratulate the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) on securing this important debate. It is as timely for people in Wales as for those in south-east England.

The background to the debate is that 2.5 million refrigerators a year are thrown out. What are the Government doing to minimise the way in which we treat those important white goods as disposable assets? We must be able to work harder with fridge manufacturers and retailers to see whether there could be more direct recycling at source, rather than having fridges go through the waste stream first and then returning as recycled material. We should consider that key point.

If a fridge still works, we should discourage people from throwing it out and encourage them to hang on to it for another year or so, rather than buy the latest cobalt blue or shiny gunmetal grey model. They should be content with their old white fridge, with alphabet magnets and poetry stuck all over it. It is sometimes environmentally more sound, because of the environmental costs of manufacturing, not to buy a new product but to continue with a slightly older one.

In our wasteful society, we have been throwing away 2.5 million fridges a year, which has a huge environmental cost. It was right and proper that the Governments of the European Union introduced legislation to try to deal with the chlorofluorocarbons found in fridges, because the link with the thinning of the ozone layer is proven. This Government had four years to prepare for that legislation but, regrettably, were not sufficiently prepared to facilitate recycling—or even incineration of fridges at designated sites, which is another option for some fridges. I am sure that we shall hear a reason for that before long.

As I said, we have been throwing away 2.5 million fridges a year, but when the legislation was introduced, we had the ability to dispose of only 8,000 a week, so we had only a 10th of the recycling capacity needed for discarded fridges. Any fridges discarded since January have either been stacked up by the local council on a farm, waste disposal site, at Newport docks or wherever, or sent to an approved facility abroad.

As I mentioned in my exchange with the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping), the good news, certainly from the perspective of people in Wales, is that Sims Metal has just opened the first fridge and freezer recycling plant to deal with the problem. Currently, it has 35,000 fridges, but that is expected to increase to 400,000. The plant can deal with commercial appliances from throughout the United Kingdom; it is not only for Wales. The plant is the fruit of a partnership between the private sector and the National Assembly for Wales, and Assembly money has been invested in it. An element of Government money is needed to kick-start a recycling facility to deal with CFCs from fridges.

The Government are spending £6 million to tackle the problem—that is mainly for storage costs, as we have heard—but I think that the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee report estimated a cost of £40 million, which could increase to as much as £64 million. We in Wales have an interest in central Government's investing in local authorities. After all, we benefit from any increase in public spending in England through the Barnett formula and the block grant, so any investment in England to meet the demands of the hon. Member for Upminster would eventually be good for Wales—although not as good as it should be, because of the formula, but that is another debate.

[Mr. Simon Thomas]

The other positive element was touched on by the hon. Member for Sherwood: the increasing numbers of local fridge recycling schemes. There are two in my constituency. CRAFT recycles all kinds of goods and delivers them to people on benefits, those who cannot afford new goods and those with a particular need. There is a direct relationship. Such goods are removed from one household, refurbished by unemployed people or those with learning disabilities, and then sent to another household. That virtuous circle benefits the community in Aberystwyth.

Another, ambitious project involves the Ceredigion Materials Conservation Association, which is trying to recycle just about everything in the county. I am pleased that it is in line for an award at the Royal Welsh show to acknowledge its success.

Mr. Sayeed: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, although the recycling of fridges is extremely valuable to employment prospects and gives poorer people adequate forms of cooling food and so on, there are problems? Under the regulations, not just the directive, recycling must be conducted under controlled circumstances, and is therefore extremely expensive.

Mr. Thomas: I accept that point, but facilities to engage in such control will spread throughout the United Kingdom. If we are to create the right virtuous circle in the recycling of fridges, there should be—I expect it—at least one such facility in each local authority area.

The report apportioned "overwhelming responsibility"—I think that those were the words—to the Government for the current fiasco. However, there is also confusion with the European Commission. Points were well made about future directives, and I would like some Select Committees—for example, the Environmental Audit Committee or the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee—to have an increased role in scrutiny. There is a tendency for matters to be passed to European Scrutiny Committees, never to be seen again. Most Members do not involve themselves in the processes of European Scrutiny Committees or Standing Committees as perhaps they do in those of Select Committees. If they did, that might be a way forward.

In advance of the debate, I contacted all 22 unitary authorities in Wales, as I wanted to know the picture. Some 16 authorities responded, and I will tell hon. Members about some of their experiences. Interestingly, only one or two local authorities reported an increase in fly-tipping. However, they reported an increase in storage and related costs. Several authorities now charge between £5 and £10 to remove fridges. That is not a huge sum of money, but for someone who cannot afford it, that is a significant disincentive to having a fridge removed from a property, when previously a retailer may have exchanged it for a new one. Three local authorities now charge. That may be a disincentive, but they claim that there is no evidence for that. One local authority claimed that the charge was to stop hoax callers—people who call out the local authority for nonsense reasons, such as asking it to remove garden rubbish instead of the fridge.

The crucial point is that the maximum charge of £10 is met by a fee of between £28 and £30, which local authorities have to pay other contractors to remove fridges. That is a huge funding gap, which I do not want the National Assembly for Wales to fill entirely, even though recycling is a devolved issue. It is down to the UK Government and the way in which they have treated the issue. They need to propose a financial settlement for all local authorities throughout the United Kingdom. The figures that I have to date suggest that the new plant in Newport is likely to charge approximately £17 to £18 to take away each fridge or freezer, which means that local authorities there will also be out of pocket.

I am told that fridges and freezers can be recycled in Europe at about £4 to £5 per unit, which worries me slightly. First, why is it much cheaper to recycle fridges in Europe than in this country? Secondly, I worry that there will be an export of fridges from this country to Europe for processing. That entails the hazard of exporting waste, although I have no doubt that there would be a way of doing it. I am concerned that one environmental "good" will be undermined by another environmental "bad". What will be the cost in fossil fuels of transporting all these fridges to be processed abroad? We will be trying to reduce the damage to the ozone layer while increasing greenhouse gas emissions. That is like shutting the vents on the greenhouse and turning up the paraffin heater. It makes no sense to deal with fridges in that way.

I hope that the Government will consider the matter carefully and ensure that it is economically and environmentally sound to deal with fridges in the United Kingdom. We should also minimise the transport of fridges, which is an environmental cost in itself. We are not going down this route in order to incur other environmental costs.

I shall conclude with one thought about how we should deal with the problem in the long term. There is a central provision in environmental and fiscal legislation that the polluter pays. We will not solve the problems of waste and recycling of fridges until the cost of disposing of them is built into the cost of purchasing them. That should include the cost of removing and recycling the fridge, which would mean a slight increase in the purchasing price of about £10 or £15 per unit. That is not a huge amount to pay to create a cleaner, better and healthier environment. I hope that the Government will examine that solution for the medium term.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): Before I call the next hon. Member, I should say that I want to call three further speakers. I shall start the winding-up speeches promptly at 10.30 am, because the Minister should have proper time to reply to the debate, which is important to the people of this country.

10.15 am

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall be brief.

There are very important lessons to be learned, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) on securing the debate and on the dispassionate way in which she spoke. Unfortunately, some of her right hon. and hon. Friends have used previous debates as an opportunity for argy-bargy and to attack my right hon. Friend the Minister. I support him, and it is universally acknowledged that he has been a splendid Minister for the Environment, who has commitment and energy.

The European Community breached three important principles of law making in passing the legislation. The first is the principle of clarity. The regulation was not clear, and a passage in the excellent report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee identified 23 areas of ambiguity. That is unacceptable; laws must be clear. There may be universal agreement on a policy, but unless the law is expressed clearly, it will not be effective.

The second principle is that the implications of the law must be understood, but they were not. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) said, with other regulations and directives coming through, it is important that the implications are fully understood. One implication of which the Government did not seem to know was that some 40 per cent. of domestic fridges in this country were refurbished and shipped to Africa.

The third principle is consultation. It is vital that those affected by laws are consulted, so that the implications can be understood. We can never have perfect foresight about a law's implications, but there are definite lessons to be learned as a result of this case.

I want to speak briefly about the restoration of the take-back scheme, which has already been mentioned by the hon. Member for Upminster and ~~my hon~~. Friend the Member for Sherwood. The regulation stopped the scheme, under which retailers collected the old equipment when they delivered new fridges. That put a stop to important schemes such as that operated by the Renew Trust in conjunction with Comet. I pay tribute to both, especially Comet for supporting the scheme in a socially responsible way.

The Renew scheme had several advantages. First, it meant that fridges would be in a good condition when they were collected. As the hon. Member for Upminster pointed out, some 20 per cent. could be refurbished when they were collected, rather than the 1 per cent. of those collected by local authorities. Secondly, disposal is more manageable. The company delivers the new fridge and takes back the old. Thirdly, Renew employs and trains the long-term unemployed and people with disabilities. I have a personal interest in that, as Renew was planning to open an outlet near my constituency—just over the border in West Bromwich—at which some 30 long-term unemployed people were to be employed and taught skills of renewing disposed fridges.

My question to my right hon. Friend the Minister is about the future of the take-back scheme. My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood mentioned the draft protocol, which was published earlier in the year and involves other stakeholders including local authorities, retailers and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. My right hon. Friend mentioned that in a newspaper article earlier in the year. The draft protocol has been published. What progress has been made on restoring the take-back scheme?

Finally, we are not good Europeans if we sign up to any old law simply because we might agree with the policy. We must ensure that the law is clear, efficacious and practical.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) on securing the debate. I must say, when I was elected I was unprepared for the fact that so much of hon. Members' time was dedicated to talking about fridges—not even nice shiny new fridges, but dead fridges. Some of the exchanges at Question Time were a bit bizarre and surreal, reminding me of the dead parrot sketch so beloved of Monty Python fans. This is a dead parrot. This is a dead fridge. However, it is not just one dead fridge; we are talking about many thousands of dead fridges that are building up around the countryside.

While we have been debating the history of the problem, people in the rest of the country have been tackling the technology problems of disposing of and recycling fridges. In the few moments that I have, I will deal with a constituency issue. Mr. Cliff Matthews of Industrial Plastics Recycling of Knighton has proved himself to be able and innovative in the field. He has developed a new technique to deal with what are called dirty plastics, which are plastics that have been used for industrial and household processes. Many have said that they could not be easily recycled, but Mr. Matthews has shown that he is able to do that. He has produced recycled plastic in a quantity and quality appreciated by people looking for feed stocks in the plastic recycling field.

Mr. Matthews is critical of some of the technologies that are used in recycling fridges. He believes that the foam and the plastic in fridges are not separated prior to being fragmented and pulverised and before the degassing process takes place. As a result, after degassing the foam and plastics cannot be separated economically to be recycled. Mr. Matthews has developed a process that separates the plastics and foam at an early stage before the degassing and fragmenting take place. He can then recycle more of a fridge than is possible with current technologies. He goes so far as to claim that he can recycle up to 99.5 per cent. of the fridge. He is critical of some of the machinery that is being imported into the country for the process, because he does not believe that it can achieve an acceptable degree of recycling. He suggests that it might not even meet the requirements of the European directive on the amount of fridge material that can be recycled.

In doing such new and innovative work, Mr. Matthews has had no support from the Environment Agency for England and Wales. I have been working with him to see whether he can get a licence for his process. Far from being encouraged, he is being prohibited at almost every stage from doing his work. I have written to the Environment Agency on several occasions and have received replies. We have reached the stage where Mr. Matthews has been told that it will be at least three months before he has any chance of starting the work he wants to do.

Will the Minister ask the Environment Agency to give more encouragement to people who are doing such innovative work, often at their own cost and through investment of their own resources? The agency should also check whether the other recycling technologies meet European directives on the amount of material in fridges that is recycled.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Only 16 months into the last Parliament my constituent Mr. Charles Curry, an engineer by training but for a long time the editor of the New Milton Advertiser and Lymington Times—

Mr. Sayeed: God's own newspaper.

Mr. Swayne: Indeed. Mr. Curry sent a facsimile advising me that the directive would cause precisely the events that have been described this morning. If the editor of a provincial newspaper could spot this coming so many years ago, how could Parliament and the Department be unable to spot the same problem? It is extraordinary.

What on earth was the rationale for signing up to article 16? The export of fridges is a perfectly proper way of recycling them: surely sending fridges to people in Africa who want and will use them is better than having them standing leaking CFCs in sites throughout the country. What is wrong with the export trade? What is wrong with the export of CFCs from the European Union, that it should be outlawed in principle?

As for foam insulation, was it reasonable for the directive to require the recycling of the foam? Even if it was reasonable, should we have signed up to it without the capacity to implement it? We have finished arguing about whether it applies to foam because we know that it applied from June last year, so why did we do nothing about it then?

How many planning consents is the Department aware of that have been granted for recycling facilities, and what capacity for recycling fridges is likely to result from them? What will be the allocation for each local authority for the current and the next financial year? I do not expect an answer this morning, but it would be useful for the information to be placed in the Library. What is the size of the current mountain, and what estimate has been made of the number of fridges illegally dumped? How many have been exported to Germany, and what are the cost implications of exporting our recycling? How much more expensive is it to export?

Last year I received another communication from Mr. Charles Curry, who warned me about the end of life directive for vehicles. I am particularly interested because I am a collector of the Dyanne variant of the Citroen Deux Chevaux—I have had five of them. It cost me £60 to get rid of my last one. If the cost of recycling is to be borne by the last owner, how much more will it cost to get rid of the next one? I do this by choice—it is my hobby—but many people drive that sort of vehicle out of necessity, because they cannot afford a newer model. Moreover, the editor warned me that I would require a special licence for doing what I customarily do—strip one and use the parts on the other. Can that be true? Can anything so absurd be envisaged?

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster): As I listened to the debate it struck me that the road to hell is paved with good intentions, and never was there a truer example than the Government's handling of the refrigerator crisis. They had a good idea; they liked the headline, and they signed the directive. Then they played for time, lost, and had an environmental crisis on their hands. Since then, they have been looking for someone else to blame.

The hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) valiantly defended the Minister by saying that things got better when he intervened. Moments before, the Minister had leapt to his feet to tell us that he had known about the proposal since 1999. At this stage, blame for the crisis must stop with the Labour Government.

10.30 am

Malcolm Bruce: I congratulate the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) on giving us an opportunity to have this debate, which is overdue and necessary. There has been a mixture of contributions, some from hon. Members who have been up to here with fridges for a long time and some from those who have entered the debate more recently.

First, those who devised the regulation—I think that it was under the Austrian presidency—believed that the technology was already available and being used. The difficulty was that the view in the United Kingdom, which is always laggardly in these matters, was that the technology was impossible and impracticable. Therefore, we could sign the directive because we could argue that what was proposed could not be done, whereas those who drafted the directive knew that it could and would be done and were already doing it, or planning to do it. Peter Jones of Biffa summarised the matter well in his evidence to the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. He said that > "the Government had lost sight of its own broad environmental strategy to reduce emissions, and rather than embracing the spirit of the Regulation it instead focused too closely on avoiding the burden of implementing its details".

I take issue with the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) who said that the regulation was full of ambiguities. The regulation was clear—its intention was completely clear. The Government knew that, and spent an awful lot of time trying to avoid implementing it. I record an exchange between a researcher in the office of a Liberal Democrat MEP who covers the environment and an official from DEFRA. When the researcher read out the regulation, the official said, "Oh, shit!", which may be unparliamentary, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but that is what she said.

Ross Cranston: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the evidence to the Select Committee on page 102, paragraph 29, which states:

> "The Commission's table of clarifications issued in February 2000 identified 23 areas of ambiguity, including three in Article 15 (now 16) where an agreed interpretation was needed."

Malcolm Bruce: There was a discussion about it, but the Government were relying on the words "where practicable". Everyone engaged in that discussion knew that it was practicable, which is why six countries fully implemented disposal of all their fridges under the existing technology. This month, there will be a mountain of 1 million unprocessed fridges in the UK. I understand—the Minister may correct me—that we have about 600,000 fridges-worth of installed capacity. It will take well over a year to get rid of the backlog before we can even begin to address the continuing problem of more old fridges coming up for recycling.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) was right to say that we should be considering ways to encourage people to refurbish their fridges and hang on to them. The hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) mentioned Africa. The argument was that Africa solved our problem because the vast majority of our old fridges were exported there. The problem is that when those fridges eventually died, Africa had no facilities to dispose of them. Sending our fridges to Africa did not help our objective of reducing emissions.

We must consider how we can get on top of the problem in respect of the regulation, because we have not done so yet. The cost to local authorities has been mentioned on several occasions. My office tried to analyse the financial implications of the problem. By dint of asking the industry the average cost of disposal and asking local authorities how many fridges on average they disposed of, we came up with a figure of between £60 million and £70 million a year. A spokesperson for DEFRA said that the Liberal Democrats were talking rubbish.

Mr. Swayne: As usual.

Malcolm Bruce: That was said as well. The reality, as has been demonstrated, is that the figure was approximately right.

The real worry, which the hon. Member for Sherwood rightly touched upon, is that local authorities, which are legally and practically responsible, are not being fully reimbursed for the cost of taking and storing fridges. The £6 million that they have received so far is considerably short of the total cost. In addition, they have to move fridges to an intermediate location. They then have to pay the cost of storage, and will have to transport the fridges to the place where they are eventually recycled. All that could have been avoided if we had acted early enough to get the capacity in place.

Biffa was more than willing to make an investment some time ago and in time to meet the requirement of the regulation, but it could not obtain clarification from DEFRA about whether the regulation would be applied. Mr. Jones said that the company would not spend £3 million investing in a plant if some fly-by-night character could come and steal the business away from it. It wants to be sure that the Government will back it up and enforce the regulation. There is clearly a difference of view about the timing, and about when the investment could have been in place.

The reference that has been made to the end of life vehicle directive is relevant. Here is a chance for us to get it right. There is enough lead time on that directive for us to think through what we are doing and solve the problem in advance. As I said earlier, the proposal that the last user should be responsible is bonkers and totally unworkable. The hon. Member for New Forest, West may be a responsible chap who pays to have his taken away, but hundreds of thousands of cars are abandoned every year and 15 per cent. of them are set alight. It costs on average £400 million a year to deal with abandoned cars, and that figure could well double if we apply this regulation. It will be a much more expensive problem than the fridges problem if we do not tackle it head on and in good time.

The lesson to be learned, and I quote the Secretary of State here, is to work with the flow of these European directives and regulations rather than resisting them. We are laggards in this country. I commend the Minister. I accept that he has a commitment to the environment and to implementing policies that will improve our environment and deal with recycling, and I suspect that he sometimes has frustrating experiences in Government when trying to get some of those policies implemented. On 2 May 2002 the Secretary of State said:

> "sometimes we have been forced to accept judgements that we have under-implemented in the past. The lesson for the future is absolutely clear: we must engage from the first stages of such discussion, be more certain of what commitments actually mean, and play a full part in negotiation of new directives . . . It is simply no good attempting to object when the debate is all over bar the shouting."

She is absolutely right, but I am not convinced that the way in which we approach these things has changed.

Austria, Germany, the Netherlands and the Scandinavian countries are way ahead of us in recycling, in terms of both their cultural commitment to it and their practical engagement with it. These are the people who are shaping the regulations and the directives—rightly so, because handing the task of creating a directive to the worst performer would represent the lowest common denominator rather than the highest aspiration. In a sense we should accept that other countries are ahead of us, and take the opportunity to catch up. Obviously I do not know the exact details of his constituent, but the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire put his finger on an interesting point. There are advantages in being late, as long as we are committed to implementing the proposals. That means that we may be able to invest in superior, more efficient and effective technology and thus demonstrate that, late as we are, we can make a realistic contribution to solving the problem.

My plea to the Government is to start doing what the Secretary of State suggests: think things through in good time, encourage people with clear directives so that they know how to invest, and ensure that the mechanisms that we have in place will deliver the desired outcome. The desired outcome is a lot less waste, a lot more recycling and a climate in which the UK can hold its head up high and say, "We are not the worst polluters in Europe; we are setting the best example." However, there is a long way to go.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) on securing the debate. Although the fridge fiasco was well catalogued by the British media and the Government have been criticised by pretty well everyone, it is fitting that the House should be presented with another opportunity to discuss how we came to such a sorry situation.

The Minister for the Environment insists that his Department was given the relevant information belatedly, but we have known for many years that no other part of a refrigerator presents such a serious threat to the ozone layer as the CFCs in the insulation foam. Because of that and because the aim of the EU regulations on fridge disposal is to safeguard the environment against ozone-depleting substances, a requirement to extract CFCs from insulation foam was inevitable. Other countries met with ease the practicalities of dealing with insulation foam; as early as October 2000, four other EU member states had the technology with which to remove that hazard. It is therefore deeply disappointing and environmentally damaging that the Government did not ensure that the UK was similarly equipped. Had they done so, we could now have a thriving fridge recycling industry.

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sayeed: No, I am sorry; I have only limited time.

Even now, the UK has only one 10th of the recycling capacity needed to implement the regulation. The Minister has admitted to the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee that a £20 million industry exporting refurbished fridges was destroyed under EU regulations. Up to 40 per cent. of the 2.5 million domestic fridges replaced every year used to be refurbished for that export market, or for poorer people in this country. The majority were exported, and most went to the poorest countries in the world which cannot afford new refrigerators in which to store essential drugs. However, the Government have now admitted that until Customs and Excise began to enforce the regulation to stop the export of refurbished fridges, the Government did not realise that the regulations would destroy that life-saving trade.

The Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee has confirmed what everyone has said all along: the current fridge fiasco has been caused by the Government's incompetence. The Government alone are to blame. The Committee said:

> "the overwhelming responsibility for mishandling the implementation of the regulation lies with the Government."

Those are the words of a Select Committee a majority of whose members are from the Government party.

The result of the Government's ineptitude is that at least 1 million fridges are piling up across the UK with few facilities to combat the problem, which will get worse. Discarded fridges are rotting and leaking the greenhouse gases that the European directive aims to have safely recycled. The Minister proceeded with the regulation without appropriate preparation and has consequently created an environmental hazard that is far worse than the one that would have occurred if he had delayed or done nothing. The Select Committee has found that the fiasco will cost the UK about £40 million, which would not otherwise have been incurred. Local authorities say that it will cost them £65 million this year alone. If we add to that the extra cost to householders and the cost for next year, we will be facing an unnecessary bill of more than £100 million.

It is imperative that the Government accept the blame for this fiasco, and learn the necessary lessons from it. Implementation of other EU directives, such as the end of life vehicle directive and the WEEE directive, is imminent. The Government must ensure that we have the ability to deal with redundant products before these directives are implemented.

When the Minister discussed matters with the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, he blamed EC officials for their tardiness in providing an authoritative ruling on whether foam was included in the regulations, but he withdrew an allegation that the European Commission was incompetent. When the Commissioner made it clear that it was the Minister who was in the wrong, the Minister blamed the waste industry for having claimed that it could provide facilities to meet the deadline for recycling foam. He neglected to say that his Department had not informed the industry of the rules under which it would have to operate. The only people who have avoided the Minister's—but not the public's—censure are the Minister and his officials in DEFRA. Even if the EU was tardy, it is an abysmal dereliction of duty not to have done what other countries did, which was to make contingency plans.

In the past, the Minister has made extravagant comments about himself. He has claimed that his performance as a Minister has resulted in the climate change programme, the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, the home energy efficiency scheme, the energy efficiency commitment, and a commitment to end fuel poverty within 10 years. Most other people have a very different opinion from the Minister's about the Government's record on the environment. Carbon dioxide emissions have increased over the past two years. Labour Members have joined Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members to stop the Government scuppering the Home Energy Conservation Bill, and hurting the fuel poor.

I accused the Minister of being the environmental fig leaf for a Government who did not give a fig for the environment, and the Minister's self-congratulatory examples prove my case. Commenting on the Government's five-year record on the environment, the Minister's erstwhile friends in Friends of the Earth highlighted the importance of the environment in modern politics and the lack of political will on the part of the Government. It would be straining parliamentary language to quote what the Home Energy Conservation Partnership has said about the Minister.

DEFRA's lack of foresight has resulted in 13 million old tyres smouldering away and polluting the atmosphere, and mountains of old fridges with no means to recycle them. Unless the Minister learns from his mistakes, they will be joined by thousands of incinerated cars and millions of dumped televisions, all of which will blight what was once a green and pleasant land.

Mr. Meacher: There is certainly a major difference between the speech of the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson), who presented a balanced, thoughtful and fair case about the problems in her constituency and in general, and the extraordinary rant that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed), who spoke from the Conservative Front Bench, which was the biggest farrago of nonsense that I have heard since he last spoke.

The hon. Lady made the point that the Government reacted too late. However, as I have related the facts so many times, I am astonished that Conservative Members are so unwilling to take on board what actually happened, and prefer to resort to the kind of political slapstick that we have just had from the Opposition Front Bench. I will take the hon. Gentleman through what happened.

legislation was passed in December 1998 by the Austrian presidency, which was keen to reach agreement quickly. Although the legislation was not published until August 1998, it went through in December of that year because of strong political pressure to secure early agreement under the Austrian presidency. That is one thing that went wrong. The real point is that no one—not the presidency, the Commission, or any Department in any member state—questioned the idea that the regulation applied only to the coolant circuit of refrigerators. That is what everyone believed. Prior to December 1998, when the regulation was passed, no one, including those in the waste management industry in the UK and elsewhere, asked whether it also applied to insulation foam. The UK industry raised the subject with us two months later in February 1999, and we immediately raised it with the Commission.

As I have said on nine separate occasions in the past two and a quarter years, between February 1999 and June 2001, my officials raised the matter at every management committee meeting, which was the right place to do so. They also raised it at formal meetings of the Commission, held to decide any details left unresolved in the Council of Ministers and to settle how directives and regulations should be implemented. My officials did absolutely the right thing. I have heard the Select Committee's response that "overwhelming responsibility" for the issue lies with the Government—the words have been correctly quoted—but that is the biggest travesty of the reality that I have ever heard.

Malcolm Bruce: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Meacher: I am unwilling to do so, because I have hardly any time. This will be the last intervention that I allow.

Malcolm Bruce: The information from the European Commission says that on 1 October 2000 it was made clear that foam should be removed. It was the British Government who questioned the practicality of doing so.

Mr. Meacher: That is simply not the case. The Commission's view before October 2000, and afterwards, was that of the UK industry—that foam removal was probably not required. There was a question about whether the "if practicable" part of article 16 applied. We continually asked for certainty on that matter, because the industry needed it. It was not until we insisted, out of the normal cycle of events, on having an extraordinary meeting in June 2001 that it was finally decided, after lengthy and anguished discussions, that it did apply. We then immediately put in place all the measures that we could in respect of local authorities, the waste management industry, and investors, in order to deal with the situation.

I absolutely insist that the Government could not have done more. The only thing that my officials accept—I must say that I agree with them—is that I should have been brought into the matter earlier. I was not informed until July 2001, and in retrospect, I think that that was wrong, and my officials agree. As I have said publicly, I would have contacted the Commissioner. I would have raised the matter in Council meetings, and I believe that I could have got an earlier answer. However, on the basis of the facts that I have given, the fault lies absolutely and wholly with the Commission. There are lessons for us to learn. I do not want to get into an argument with the Commission, but I have given the facts, and I need those facts to be recognised.

The UK industry has now made the investment necessary to enable the safe disposal of fridges. I entirely absolve it of blame for the fact that seven months was too short a time for it to be able to do so before 1 January 2002. Four plants have been operating for several weeks. Another opened last week, and a further five are due to come on line this year, two of them in August. We therefore expect the fridge mountain to begin to reduce from October.

The hon. Member for Upminster asked, perfectly fairly, why we did not delay implementation of the directive. Of course we thought about that. It would have been desirable, but the directive does not have to be transposed into UK law; it is a regulation that has applied automatically to every member state from 1 January 2002. Once it had been passed—in fact, two or three years before that—it required the agreement of not only the Commission but all member states to delay its implementation. As has been said repeatedly, four member states already had the relevant technology and would not have agreed, so we could not get a postponement of the directive.

Exports have been ended—rightly, I think—because developing countries do not have disposal facilities. The object is to prevent leakage or gassing, which causes gas to enter the atmosphere and deplete the ozone layer.

I have said, and I repeat what others have said, that our best estimate of the initial annual UK cost is about £40 million. That cost will decrease as plants are commissioned—I have already said that there will be 10 by the end of the year—competition becomes established and more fridges that do not require treatment enter the waste stream.

I was asked about the retailer take-back scheme. I am keen for the scheme to resume operation. The decision to stop it was not required by the regulation, but it was a commercial decision taken partly because of the end of the export trade. The retailers said that they could not continue the scheme without adequate treatment facilities. The main barrier to the scheme is the increased cost associated with fridge disposal. I hope that we will soon be able to make a statement about funding, although any decision must be taken in the context of the spending review. Further to several meetings that I have held with the retailers, I believe that conditions required to put the retailer take-back system in place are fulfilled.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) mentioned lessons, and there are two to be learned. I agree with hon. Members who have said that we should follow through all implementation details before passing a directive or regulation. Of course, that is right. It did not happen this time because prior to December 1998, nobody anticipated the full implications. We must learn that lesson and ensure that this situation does not happen again. The second lesson is that if there are outstanding details, the European Commission's management committee must reply promptly. I underline that several times.

It was correctly said that four member states had the technology in place at the outset. Eight member states now have plants to deal with fridges, and at least four or five have adequate capacity to handle all their waste fridges. Luxembourg hires a plant to deal with its fridges as necessary. The remaining six or seven member states are in a worse position than the UK. By the end of the year, or shortly after, we will be able to reprocess the vast majority of our fridges, and certainly 1.2 million per year by the end of next month. We have made substantial progress.

I turn to the waste electrical and electronic equipment directive—WEEE—and the end of life vehicles directive. Both directives must be transposed into UK law before they are applicable, which gives us time to implement them properly. That is the key point. We will not implement the directives until we are confident that facilities are in place. Fridges were covered by a regulation, which meant that it came into force in all member states automatically.

It is a key point that we will not have the uncertainty about each new directive that we had with fridges. The WEEE directive is subject to conciliation, and it is still going through Brussels. It will not come into force until 2004, which gives us sufficient time to deal with it. We are consulting local authorities and industry even before the directive has been finally approved.

We carried out one round of consultations in March 2001 on the hazardous waste directive, and a second round will be held later this year. Legislation is now in place implementing the landfill directive in England and Wales. There has been uncertainty about the waste acceptance criteria. Brussels has extensively delayed letting us know what the criteria will be, and they will not be finalised until a vote is taken on 23 July. We need the criteria in order to decide the different classes of landfill and what is hazardous, non-hazardous or inert. That information has still not been provided.

As the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) said, the Department of Trade and Industry is leading the way on implementation of the end of life vehicles directive, but I assure him that there is the closest liaison about it. Even though both Departments are involved because of their different interests, we are working closely to ensure that the directive comes into force smoothly. The technology is already available and we do not foresee any problems.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

European Union

11 am

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly): I was a Member of the European Parliament for 10 years. I was elected in 1989, and one of the first things that I was told when I arrived in the Chamber was that as the European Union was a democratic entity, if it applied to join itself, it would not be admitted. Of course, what was meant by that was that in those days, although the EU was strong on the rhetoric of democracy, there was little there of any substance.

However, I saw a dramatic change take place during the 10 years that I was a Member of the European Parliament, which was brought about by fundamental treaty alterations. There was the Single European Act, which Mrs. Thatcher had the good sense to support, and the treaties of Maastricht and Amsterdam.

Because of those treaty changes, the European Parliament has significant democratic powers today. It has the power of scrutiny over other bodies such as the European Central Bank and the European Commission. It has significant budgetary powers, and can have significant influence over the EU budget for non-compulsory areas of expenditure. Most importantly, it has a range of different and significant legislative powers, chiefly the power of co-decision, which the Parliament uses in a responsible and coherent way.

The powers of the European Parliament were most clearly demonstrated in 1999, when it dismissed the Santer Commission en bloc. That single act had a profound influence on the people of Europe's perception of the European Parliament. It also markedly changed the power relationship between the European Commission and the Parliament. We should remember that the European Parliament is the only institution that is directly elected by the people of Europe. National Parliaments and the European Parliament should work together in partnership.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): Would the hon. Gentleman care to observe whether he thinks that the sense of connection between MEPs and the electorate has been enhanced or diminished by the change from first past the post to a list system of election?

Mr. David: My personal view is that the move to the unfortunate form of proportional representation that we now have was a retrograde step. I am convinced that first past the post is the most appropriate method of election in this country for all tiers of government—and that definitely applies to the European Parliament.

As well as the European Parliament, there is the European Commission. The Commission is the custodian of the European treaties. It has the sole power to initiate legislation. It represents the EU as a whole in trade negotiations, provides the administration of the EU and overrides sectional interests in the broader interests of the Community as a whole.

As well as having those significant powers, the Commission is the subject of constant criticism, not least by the tabloid press. How many times have we heard tales about square strawberries and straight bananas, attempts by the Commission to introduce fishermen's hairnets, and other nonsensical stories? When I was a Member of the European Parliament, the fishermen's hairnets story was running in the UK tabloid press, and I made inquiries of the Parliament and the Commission to see where that story had emanated from. No one had any idea. Almost in desperation, I visited a famous watering hole in Brussels called Kitty O'Shea's for half a Guinness, and lo and behold, I met the members of the British press corps joking among themselves. They had invented the story about fishermen's hairnets and sent it back to the UK, and to their amazement, it hit the front pages of the newspapers. That is a fair indication of how the irresponsible press in this country all too often misrepresents what happens in the European Union.

It is worth remembering that, although it is not faultless, the European Commission has only 17,000 civil servants—a bureaucracy far smaller than the many Government Departments in this country. The EU bureaucracy is also one of the most open that I have come across. It is often easier to gain access to Commission civil servants than it is to civil servants in this country.

The third element of the triumvirate of important institutions in the European Union is the Council of Ministers. It is there that power ultimately resides; it is there that most decisions affecting the development of the EU and the lives of European citizens are made, whether through unanimity or qualified majority voting.

Over the past couple of years there has been an increase in the influence of the Council of Ministers, particularly over the second and third pillars of the European treaties—the pillars of common foreign and security policy and the embryonic European defence and security policy, and justice and home affairs. People often ask whether the Council of Ministers is democratic. The European Council meets four times a year. It is made up of democratically elected Heads of Government, who are drawn from national states. The Council of Ministers, which makes many key decisions, is made up of national Government Ministers, elected by the people and accountable to national Parliaments. It is important to bear such matters in mind when considering democracy in the European Union.

Many unfair criticisms are made of the EU, and they are often extremely nationalistic in tone. Nevertheless, we have to accept that most people in the European Union regard its institutions as remote. Some regard them as irrelevant, and that is clearly shown by the low turnout for the European Parliament elections, not only in this country but in other EU countries. Those of us who believe in Europe and in democracy must accept that things have to change, and change radically. The status quo cannot be the way forward. I was pleased therefore that there was clear acceptance of that at the Laeken summit. A key extract from the declaration agreed by member states at Laeken is:

> "The European Union derives its legitimacy from the democratic values it projects, the aims it pursues and the powers and instruments it possesses. However, the European project also derives its legitimacy from democratic, transparent and efficient institutions...The first question is thus how we can increase the democratic legitimacy and transparency of the present institutions, a question which is valid for the three institutions."

I agree 100 per cent. with that declaration. Such a clear statement was a monumental step forward. Following that, a decision was made at Laeken to establish a convention to consider the future of Europe. The convention on the future of Europe has already begun its deliberations, and although it is early days, significant progress has been made. I hope that strong recommendations will be made to the next intergovernmental conference. The convention comprises Ministers from the member states, and representatives of the European Parliament, the European Commission and the United Kingdom Parliament. I am pleased that our representatives are already reporting back to this Parliament effectively, and I hope that that will continue.

We have a long way to go, but the situation is encouraging. I am pleased that the European Scrutiny Committee is already making a significant contribution to the debate on Europe's development, which must be held here and in the institutions of Europe. I warmly commend the European Scrutiny Committee's report to hon. Members, and I hope that they will take the trouble to read it. If it is implemented, it will have a profound effect for the better on our future work. I also hope that representations about debating the report fully on the Floor of the House will be taken up, and that there will be such a debate in the near future.

Angus Robertson (Moray): The European Scrutiny Committee published a report on the scrutiny of European business in the United Kingdom. One of its recommendations was that we should consider lifting the confidentiality of the relationship between the different Administrations in the UK. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that his colleague the Minister should listen to that suggestion and pursue it? After all, we are talking about transparency, democracy and accountability, which are relevant to the UK as well as to the European Union.

Mr. David: As I said, democracy and transparency are essential, given the relationship between the different elements of government that now exist in the United Kingdom. Our democracy is evolving internally, which means that democracy and transparency must always be scrutinised so that we have the best possible systems.

I will focus briefly on some of the changes that I would like to see over the next few months, and on how Europe might develop. This is not the time or the place to debate in detail the report of the European Scrutiny Committee, but my comments are complementary to the thrust of its arguments.

The European Union is an association of independent sovereign states that decide from time to time to pool their sovereignty in their mutual best interests. If hon. Members accept my definition of what the EU is in essence, it follows that the Council of Ministers has a pivotal role in the EU's development. I want far more coherent intergovernmental co-operation and better organisation of the Council's work. It is significant that there was a step forward in that respect at the summit in Seville. However, we have much further to go, and I hope that that issue will be carefully considered.

We must consider especially the ending of the six-month presidency of the European Council. We talk about the future enlargement of the EU and an increase in the number of member states from 15 to 25, so it is nonsense to have a rotating presidency and, as a consequence, a shifting agenda every six months. I would like the Council of Ministers to have a more permanent chair; I would even like consideration to be given to the idea of a president—but before anyone suggests that that should be Tony Blair, I must say that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is already doing a good job here. No Labour Members would like him to move from his effective role in this country.

We should consider more generally the need for better organisation of the work of the Council of Ministers. It needs an annual agenda, a work programme, and, above all, a clear sense of strategic direction. We need to know where the European Union as a whole is going, not only in a few months' time, but in the years ahead. The Council of Ministers should be responsible for providing that sense of purpose and direction.

There is also a need in certain areas for intergovernmental co-operation to be strengthened, particularly in terms of deepening the common foreign and security policy and the EDSP. The relationship between the European Commission and the Council should perhaps be redefined. Inevitably, we need to look objectively at whether qualified majority voting should be adhered to or extended. There is a case for that in some areas, but in others there is not. The issue must be examined carefully, in our national interest.

One vital reform to reinforce democracy would be for the Council to make its legislation in public. In a modern democracy, it is unacceptable for the Council of Ministers to meet behind closed doors to agree legislation that will affect the citizens of Europe, including those of our country.

Another area that needs careful examination is the role of the European Commission. I am one of the people who believe that the European Commission should be more accountable; although it should retain its right of initiative, political direction in the EU should come from the Council of Ministers. The European Commission should be less of a political body and more of a civil service, taking its lead from the elected representatives on the Council.

I shall not dwell on the subject of national Parliaments, other than to say that they have an essential role in the development of democracy in the EU, in scrutiny and, vitally, in defining whether the principle of subsidiarity is applied. Subsidiarity is essentially a political rather than a judicial term.

Angus Robertson: I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman has brought up the issue of subsidiarity, because it is relevant not only to member states but to sub-state legislatures. The transfer of information is another key area. The Government have stressed repeatedly that they do transfer information, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware of correspondence from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Foreign Office confirming that agendas of Council of Ministers meetings have not been forwarded. He will also know that despite the Government's assurance to the European Scrutiny Committee that that practice will end, there has been a more recent example of information not being forwarded. How can subsidiarity be properly observed if Whitehall Departments do not forward information to the Welsh Assembly, the Scottish Parliament or the Northern Ireland Assembly?

Mr. David: I repeat that I genuinely believe that the Government are willing to ensure that there is participation and accountability. However, the mechanics to achieve that aim are not always in place—and that applies to Whitehall Departments. The relationship with the devolved institutions is a developing one, and it will take time to make sure that the mechanics are in place effectively. One of the most impressive aspects of the devolution settlement is the good relationship between central Government and both the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales. We need to build on that good will to ensure that the settlement works as effectively as possible.

As I said, the European Parliament has considerable powers and, given the complexity of the legislative processes with which it is involved, we need to ensure that its involvement is as effective and efficient as possible. It also needs more openness. The co-decision process is complex but needs to be far more transparent. The emphasis should be on that, rather than on giving the European Parliament more powers for the sake of it. We should bear in mind the fact that turnout in the previous European Parliament elections was just 24 per cent. in this country. The emphasis must be on raising the credibility and acceptance of the European Parliament, rather than arguing for it to have still more powers.

My thesis is that although the European Union is not as undemocratic as many claim, there is room for significant improvement. I hope that the convention on the Future of Europe will make proposals about how Europe can be made more democratic that are acceptable to all member states and parties. Above all, as well as arguing for democracy, we must take that opportunity to define a new vision for the people of Europe.

Perhaps we politicians should speak less about comitology, proximity and subsidiarity, and more about issues to which people can relate more easily, such as jobs, peace and the environment. That is why a good starting point for the new treaty that I hope will result from the next intergovernmental conference would be to define clearly what European co-operation is all about. If we do that, we will have a good chance of one day making the EU popular among all the people of Europe.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): I congratulate the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) on introducing the debate and on trying to unravel the complex and rather mysterious ways of the European system for people such as me, who are not great experts on the intricacies of that institution.

I am keen on enlargement of the European Union, because apart from anything else, most if not all the aspirant countries see it as a means of strengthening their own democracy. In recent times many of those countries suffered regimes that were far from democratic; even in today's world, those democracies could sometimes be regarded as fragile. Indeed, in my lifetime, existing members of the EU have had regimes that we would not regard as democratic. One thinks of Portugal under Salazar, Spain under Franco and Greece under the colonels. However, now it would be strange to think of those countries as not at the forefront of democracy. Not long ago some countries that hope to join the EU, such as Romania and Bulgaria, were perceived as among the most undemocratic countries not only in Europe but in the world. We must therefore make progress on enlargement and other issues.

There is, however, always a problem. If the processes are not correct, the smaller countries will feel that the large countries will overrule them. That is undoubtedly a difficult balance, as one of the Balkan countries has shown. One of the many complex reasons for the break-up of Yugoslavia was that some of the smaller republics in the federation felt that the larger two republics—Serbia and Croatia—were constantly overruling them. Again, I ask the Minister to say how the moves to admit Yugoslavia to the Council of Europe are progressing.

As the hon. Member for Caerphilly said, many British people wonder how the EU works. Some of its procedures seem so shrouded in mystery that people wonder what influence they have on it.

After an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring), the hon. Member for Caerphilly spoke about elections to the European Parliament. I have never seen people so worked up about electoral arrangements: the current system of party lists seems so unfair. For the benefit of Labour Members, I should explain that one of their London MEPs wisely decided to join the Conservatives—surely there is a democratic deficit in that the individual was elected under a party list system and those who voted for a Labour MEP now have a Conservative one. They should be delighted because, like the gentleman concerned, they have realised the error of their ways. However, it is patently not very democratic when someone elected on a party list system crosses the Floor.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I am intrigued by the hon. Gentleman's argument. My party has always supported the single transferable vote and we accept that the existing system has major weaknesses. However, what is the difference between what the hon. Gentleman describes and the first-past-the-post system, under which many people have crossed the floor to join different political parties?

Mr. Randall: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but first past the post applies to constituencies and single members. Rightly or wrongly, most people do not vote for the person, but the party. Those elected always claim that they were voted in as a person. However, the system that I am describing is overtly wrong because people vote for a party, and the system does not stand up when those elected change their party allegiance. I often wonder what would happen if a by-election were always necessary when members crossed the Floor; I doubt whether they would be so ready to do so. It is largely a matter for individual Members' consciences, but if people are elected under a party system there should be no doubt about what that should entail. That is just one example of why people regard the processes of the EU as undemocratic.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly spoke about rolling six-month presidencies. I understand his point, but further questions arise about a directly elected president. No one wants failed politicians dumped into that position in order to get them out of the way. Who will do the direct electing—the whole population or a smaller constituency? How will that affect smaller countries, which might conclude that there will always be a French, German, Italian or British president? The system is so large and unwieldy that we must be careful about how we progress.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting counter-point. In a European Union of 25 or more countries, the presidency might come round to every country once every 12 years or so. As my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly said, we need to rethink the process and find a way, perhaps through regional blocs within the EU, to establish agreement on how to organise the presidency in future.

Mr. Randall: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. I am not advocating a particular system. I am not sure of the benefits of the current presidency system even with the existing number of member states. With an enlarged EU, it would become unwieldy.

I have always shied away from the complexities of the European Union and concentrated more parochially on matters that affect the United Kingdom and, more importantly, my constituents in Uxbridge. The EU's problem is that it seems distant from the everyday lives of my constituents, except when they are seemingly told that they cannot do this or must do that because of Europe. That is a spurious impression, which we in this House sometimes use as a let-out. However, if their Member of Parliament—admittedly not one of the world's greatest brains—cannot give an answer, it is difficult for the average person in Uxbridge to ascertain how decisions are made.

Time is short, and I do not want to labour the point, but if the EU is going to persuade the people of this country of the merits and benefits of membership, it must get its own house in order. For the EU to ask for reruns of referendums until it gets the right answer is more like what happens in Whips Offices than what happens in a democratic institution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): I call Mr. Win Griffiths.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I had not requested to speak, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have to leave before the end of the debate, and it would not be fair on other Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have never been present at a debate of this importance in which no one has risen to speak.

Mr. Moore rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Michael Moore will start the winding-up speeches for the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Like you, I think it is a shame that there are not more willing participants in the Chamber for such an important debate. It rather weakens the argument of this place that we want more scrutiny over European affairs if we cannot muster more than two contributions before the winding-up speeches. However, that does not detract from the importance of the issue. I congratulate the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) on once again focusing our minds on an important aspect of European business. There is perhaps nothing more fundamental than the democratic nature of the institutions of the European Union.

The EU has been in existence for close to 50 years and has evolved considerably during that period. Its original aims and objectives focused on underpinning the security of nation states that had spent much of the previous few hundred years at war with one another. It also had the desire to develop and promote prosperity within the member countries, and at all times it has been a club for democrats. As the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) said, within living memory the Governments of Spain, Portugal and Greece were not suitable for membership of the EU. There were dictators at the heart of Europe, but the carrot of EU membership was important in those countries' rapid progression towards democracy. Those democracies have undoubtedly developed and are now full partners in the Union.

We hope that we are poised on the verge of significant enlargement. Many countries that were once under the shadow of the USSR are poised to entrench their democracies in the EU. Of the current applicant countries, only Turkey fails to meet the political criteria set out by member states years ago at the Copenhagen summit, and cannot expect to join until that is resolved. Those countries are rightly focused on the democratic values and institutions that allow them to become part of the EU, but as the hon. Member for Caerphilly briefly outlined, there is an unhappy contrast between the democratic responsibilities of those who wish to be part of the club and the practices of the club itself. He mentioned that in 1989 the question was asked whether the EU would be admitted to its own club—and many could still argue that point today, but I hope that we can afford to be optimistic that the process of reform will develop a momentum to tackle many of the weaknesses.

The crisis of legitimacy, which is at the heart of the EU, rightly gives rise to much soul searching. We hear a lot about the democratic deficit, the failure of accountability and the need to reconnect the electorate with a plethora of unloved European institutions. Many of the failings of those institutions have been rehearsed this morning. There is a lack of clarity about the EU's purpose, with no clearly defined mission statement and a legislative footprint some 80,000 pages high, and rising. There is no clear focus on subsidiarity, which would ensure that decisions were taken at the most appropriate level in the EU.

As has oft been remarked, there is clearly a lack of openness in key institutions. Perhaps most damagingly, there is a lack of accountability, because of the inherent imbalance both among the EU's institutions and between the institutions and member states.

Angus Robertson: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that one of our greatest challenges is to end the perception that the EU is based simply in Brussels, rather than also being close to home, with member state Governments and devolved Governments? Ending that perception might help to change the way in which the Government work in a European context. The EU is not only over there; it is over here, too.

Mr. Moore: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. There was an unasked question about how the Scottish Parliament and other devolved institutions should relate to that idea, and I agree with the hon. Member for Caerphilly that this is clearly an evolving process. No one would accept that those relationships are fully developed, but as devolution beds down, we need to learn what the right level for decision making is.

Angus Robertson: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that as a minimum, we should hold to the rules clearly laid out in the concordats that govern the relationship between the UK Government and the Executives of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland? Devolution is an evolving process, but when the relationship between Governments is governed by rules, those rules should be held to, and they should be transparent.

Mr. Moore: I must make it clear that I do not share the hon. Gentleman's view of what the devolution process might evolve into in the end, and I have no wish to see Scotland independent from the rest of the United Kingdom. However, I agree that rules should be adhered to, and I pay tribute to his sometimes lonely one-man battle against everything in Whitehall in which he feels that Scotland is not getting its share. I wish him luck in that.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South): Obviously it is essential that the Scottish Parliament should be deeply involved in Europe, and that Scotland should also be part of the UK. However, does the hon. Gentleman not agree that the real challenge, especially in view of the enlargement of the EU, is to connect with the people in more detail and ensure that they understand EU procedures? We do not want them to feel divorced from the decision making.

Mr. Moore: I am in danger of talking myself into a cul-de-sac in which I shall not be able to make the points that the hon. Gentleman has just made. I am grateful to him for refocusing our discussion. The hon. Member for Moray (Angus Robertson) may not agree, but because Scotland is still in the early years after devolution, we should see how its relationship with Europe develops and recognise that its future is best secured as part of the United Kingdom.

Angus Robertson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moore: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman twice already, and I want to make progress—

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) rose—

Mr. Moore: I shall take just one more intervention, and give way to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Drew: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for not being present at the start of the debate; otherwise, I would certainly have tried to catch your eye.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the isolation of MEPs. My problem is more with what happens when they come over here. I am thinking of the farce of the current so-called foot and mouth investigation being carried out by MEPs. We should examine more fundamentally the relationship between MEPs and Members of this House, because of the way in which people can trample into one's constituency without any recognition of the damage done. All the wrong impressions can be created, so is it not time to examine the relationship more carefully?

Mr. Moore: I do not want to be dragged into the hon. Gentleman's private grief. He has clearly suffered from specific difficulties, on which I cannot comment. However, those problems can emerge as democracies evolve—in Scotland, for example, because of the Scottish Parliament. Some hon. Members are unhappy about the presence of Members of the Scottish Parliament on their territory. Frankly, we all have to learn to live with one another. It would surely be wrong to prevent MEPs elected in this country from visiting parts of it to investigate important issues on a European basis.

Before I generously gave way to several colleagues, I was arguing that over many years we have lost any clear focus on what European institutions are about. The lack of openness and accountability has led to increasingly poor awareness of what is going on among EU voters and growing hostility to much of what the EU quite properly seeks to achieve. A quick glance at the Eurobarometer polls will confirm that.

The EU has several handicaps to overcome. It is necessarily distant because it is "over there". I welcome the participation of its representatives in domestic British political life as well as in Strasbourg and Brussels. Much EU argument is also necessarily technical, but perhaps the biggest handicap is that the EU has had to evolve from tackling one set of problems from a particular era to tackling another set in today's considerably different political context. It is right to scrutinise the purpose of European institutions and to realign them to tackle today's problems more effectively.

We cannot afford to be apologists for the EU, but we can dare to be optimistic. As the EU prepares to admit up to 10 new member states, we know of widespread acceptance of the need for reform, and the convention on the future of Europe is addressing that right now.

Our party is reviewing its policy towards the EU to take account of the changing nature of the European body politic. We have consistently supported the need to reform European institutions and warned of the urgent need to tackle the alarming gap between those institutions and the electorate. First and foremost, we need a clear statement of what the EU is about. We therefore vigorously support the idea of a constitution for the EU, simplifying the many treaties currently in existence, and defining and limiting its powers. If citizens are to have a stake in the European Union, the charter of fundamental rights must be at the heart of the constitution. It is vital for the institutions to make subsidiarity a reality. Decisions should be local where possible, national where necessary, and European where appropriate.

Not only should the principles be embedded in a constitution, but we should ensure that the European Parliament and national Parliaments have an ongoing role in putting them into practice. Much greater openness is required to achieve those aims. All institutions should, as a basic premise, conform to the principles of freedom of information. The Council of Ministers should meet in public when it discusses legislation. A full account of those proceedings and the decisions that have been taken should be published as a matter of course, and should be available for scrutiny in the European Parliament, and in this and other national Parliaments. We should not have the constant battle of having to table the right parliamentary questions to get information out of Ministers.

Greater accountability is also important. The leader of the country that holds the presidency should appear before the European Parliament before and after meetings of the Council. Many different views have been expressed about a rotating presidency. The Liberal Democrats are agnostic on the issue at present—we will watch how the debate develops. The annual "State of the Union" address given by the President of the European Commission should be accompanied by detailed proposals and justification for them under the constitution—particularly with regard to subsidiarity. Commissioners should be scrutinised about their proposals by the European Parliament, which should have the power to vet and veto each Commissioner, not simply the whole group en masse.

The most important aspect of the matter relates to Westminster—we too need to step up a gear. I pay tribute to the work of the Committees that scrutinise European Union activities in both Houses. However, we need to make Ministers' accountability a bigger deal. Perhaps the Minister will tell us when he expects to give evidence to the Committees on the work of the convention, and particularly on the Government's view of how Europe should look after 2004. He had an opportunity to set that out in a recent debate before the Laeken summit, and he has another opportunity to do so this morning. We are still short of specifics. As we approach the recess, and face the prospect of the convention making some key decisions before we return in the autumn, it is scandalous that we still do not have a clear picture of the specifics that the Government will propose and the position that they will seek to negotiate in the convention.

In this Parliament, we pride ourselves on being closer to those who elect us than the European Union institutions are to those who elect them. That may be one of our bigger conceits. If we are to ensure that it is true, we need to raise our collective game. We need to ensure that all substantial Government plans for the Council of Ministers are put to Committees before they are discussed in the Council of Ministers itself. Ministers should, as a matter of course, be required to attend key Committees after meetings of the Council, in order to be scrutinised on what they have been doing.

Europe is, unfortunately, largely unloved. That is partly the fault of those who represent its institutions to the outside world and partly a result of the actions of those who disagree with its very construct. That is politics. We should be ambitious for the European Union; it is a precious idea that needs fostering. However, those ambitions should relate not simply to extending the scope and power of the institutions, but to reforming what we have. We should make the European Union more capable of carrying out its existing functions and more in touch with the people on whose behalf it exists.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): I congratulate the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) on securing this debate. He is a passionate enthusiast for enlargement, and I applaud him for that. I entirely share those sentiments. I also thank him for his insights based on his knowledge of the European Parliament and its workings, which are an important part of the architecture of the European Union.

A lively debate is taking place about democracy and the EU, much of it surrounding the convention on the future of Europe. We believe that reform of the EU's institutions should be based on three elements. First—this is now almost universally agreed—the EU suffers from an acute democratic deficit. The power wielded through its institutions must be made more accountable through greater transparency and greater responsiveness to people's wishes. Secondly, the principle of subsidiarity—at present theoretically embedded in the acquis communautaire but in reality ineffective—must become truly efficacious. That is a crucial point. The history of the EU has been one of working from the top down. That is no longer acceptable. The EU must now work from the bottom up.

Thirdly, it should be recognised that the member states are the fundamental constituent entities of the EU. Any reform that fails to understand that will not succeed; indeed, the first two principles fold into the third. The peoples of Europe naturally look to their national Parliaments to hold the exercise of power to account. They are also the main means for the expression of their wishes. That has become even more the case now that we have moved away from the first-past-the-post system for elections to the European Parliament. Change in Europe should flow upwards from the peoples of Europe; they should not be driven centrally. If we cleave to those three principles we can help to cure the alienation of the EU from the peoples of Europe, and reform an enlarged EU into something that delivers what its peoples want.

Angus Robertson: I know that the hon. Gentleman is well read, so I am certain that he will have read The Scotsman yesterday. On the issue of centralism and power exercised at the centre, was he as surprised as I was—I was delighted, although slightly confused—to read that

Is the hon. Gentleman surprised that we have not heard anything officially from the Government on this? Does he share my hope that the Minister, who was mentioned in the article, might be able to tell hon. Members what the Government's policies are?

Mr. Spring: I am sure that the Minister for Europe will have heard that, and he will be able to confirm or deny what was reported in that august newspaper. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that leaks and spinning, rather than directly telling Parliament what is going on, is one of the Government's most unattractive characteristics.

I am sorry to say that the Government have been disappointing in their failure to find constructive solutions to the challenges that the EU faces. They have had two big ideas for the reform of the EU's institutions. One has been shot down in flames, and the other has done a magnificent job of raising the hackles of the smaller member states. The Prime Minister's proposal to set up a second chamber of the European Parliament was greeted with silence and/or embarrassment by our EU partners. The House of Commons European Scrutiny Committee rejected the proposal and the subtitle of the report by the House of Lords European Union Committee—spells out its unacceptability. I hope that the Government will stop promoting this impractical scheme and turn to something more constructive.

Mr. David: Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that by raising the issue of a second chamber of the European Parliament, the Government have ensured that the debate about the role of national Parliaments is centre stage?

Mr. Spring: The fact is that there is a void in the Government's practical thinking on the future architecture of the European Union. I do not accept that the Prime Minister raised the issue simply to underline the importance of national Parliaments, and I do not believe that our European partners saw it in that light either.

The plan for a president of the European Council was referred to as—I quote from the Financial Times:

> "someone Europe's citizens would identify as the driving force of the European agenda".

His legitimacy would, apparently, be that he would be > "responsible to elected heads of government".

There are three main difficulties with that proposal. There is insufficient time to discuss the first, which is such a president's over-powerful and undefined role in foreign policy. The second is the matter of accountability, which was tellingly raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall). How would that individual be appointed? To whom would he or she be answerable? How could he be sacked if member states were unhappy with his conduct? The proposed position would be influential, but at present its legitimacy would be tenuous. Those are all-important questions.

It is absolutely right that we should consider the role of the presidency in the light of the enlargement process, but it is important to ask how such a post would enhance democratic accountability in the European Union. We accept that that will be a major challenge. I hope that the Minister will answer those questions in some detail in due course. Thirdly, any proposal for reform of the European Union must take account of the different hopes, needs and fears of its larger and smaller members if it is to be workable.

To be fair to the Minister, I welcome the reform of the workings of the Council introduced at Seville. Britain played its part in bringing them forward, but it is disappointing that the Government have not spent more of their time on practical, substantive reform measures.

Mr. Drew: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman's arguments, but they would have more credibility if the previous Government, whom he supported, had not ceded economic power through the Single European Act. Would the hon. Gentleman care to wax lyrical on the dreadful mistake that his Government made in giving away economic powers? Now it looks as if we are giving away political powers too.

Mr. Spring: I hope that the Minister heard that comment. The creation of the single European market has been the crown jewel of what has happened in the European Union. An enormous trading area, which will be expanded in due course, and which has greatly benefited all Europe's citizens, has been created. I am disappointed by the hon. Gentleman's view, as I cannot think what the alternative would be. This is one instance in which the European Union as a trading bloc has particular clout in its discussions with other important trading countries and blocs. The sooner we remove the inhibitions to trade across the European Union and diminish the restrictions involved, the better. It was one of the most impressive things that the Conservative Government sought to introduce, given our commitment to the free enterprise system.

The European Scrutiny Committee's report must be commended; it is a model of intelligent analysis of the EU's failings and needs. It rightly identifies the disconnection between the EU and its peoples as a central problem. As it says, the Council's lack of openness is unacceptable, and a few television cameras will not mend that. If the Council, which should be the driving force in the European Union, cannot become accountable, the EU will never be properly answerable to its citizens. As the report says, parliamentary scrutiny needs to be fundamentally enhanced.

I was interested in some of the points made by the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) about how we could enhance scrutiny. Consideration of how that can most usefully be done crosses any party political divide.

Angus Robertson: As for cross-party unity on scrutiny, does the hon. Gentleman agree that scrutiny should also be exercised in relation to the scrutiny reserve in Parliament and the Assemblies of the United Kingdom that have a legislative role, so that where power is exercised by people elected to those Administrations, they can influence the European decision-making process more effectively?

Mr. Spring: Scrutiny in any Parliament, Assembly or council in the United Kingdom is vital to the democratic process. We are especially persuaded by the recommendation to replace civil service representation on COREPER with a senior Minister based mainly in Brussels, but answerable directly and regularly to the House of Commons. That would be a great advance in making the Council's processes accountable to national Parliaments. By taking that step, Britain could set an excellent example to other member states. I was delighted that the Council's report backed the creation of a subsidiarity watchdog. Conservatives have been pressing for such a body for some time. I am especially pleased that the Scottish First Minister backed the idea that I put to the European Committee of the Scottish Parliament when I gave evidence for its report on the governance of the EU. The hon. Member for Moray (Angus Robertson) will be aware of that. As the Scottish First Minister says:

> "The new Subsidiarity Council would be able to stop the EU from interfering in areas better handled at a more local level. The new Europe should be more diverse, less centralised".

I hope that the Minister, too, will agree with our sensible proposal.

Importantly, the Committee's report proposed that such a body should be composed of elected politicians, not judges. No one disputes that the European Court of Justice cannot help but prefer action to be taken at a European level, as it is a European body. That is clear from its poor record of enforcing the principle of subsidiarity in its judgments. The only way of making subsidiarity real is through the enforcement of that principle by a body composed of politicians from national Parliaments.

No part of the European process creates more unease among Europe's citizens than the so-called ratchet effect. Europe appears to many to be on a journey with no clear end, and with ever more powers pushed towards the centre. That end must be defined, as we need a sense of finality. That worry is not confined to Britain. The German länder are concerned about their relationship to the federal Government, and about the intrusion of central European institutions.

Two actions must be taken if such intrusion is to be stopped. First, we need the clearest possible definition of competencies. I was pleased that the European Scrutiny Committee reached the same conclusion, that what is done should be the minimum possible. Secondly, it should be clear that we shall obtain a sense of finality only when the phrase "ever closer union" is deleted from the treaties. It sums up the perception in the EU that the Union is engaged in a one-way process towards greater centralisation, regardless of what citizens want. The report of the European Scrutiny Committee was clear about that. The removal of the phrase could help to guide the European Court of Justice towards a less centralising jurisprudence, and send a signal that there had been a reappraisal of what an enlarged EU is all about.

I shall add one last point. It is widely recognised that the Community method, particularly the role of the Commission, is not democratic. Unless there is reform we will never achieve the end that we desire: a democratic and accountable European Union. I understand that the smaller member states regard the Commission as necessary to ensure that the larger states do not dominate the EU, but we believe that the Commission's role must be transformed. It must work much more as the servant rather than the master of the European process.

A European Union of nation states, with national Parliaments at its heart, is not only desirable but achievable. Indeed, we believe that only a union based clearly on member states and recognised as such will satisfy today's need for democracy and reverse popular disconnection and disengagement from Europe's institutions. Archaic dirigiste structures and grand constitutional plans will not achieve that end. The Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Minister for Europe have frequently analysed correctly and persuasively the challenges facing the EU, but have totally failed to come up with specific, substantive and clear proposals to address those challenges. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity, on behalf of the Government, to show the leadership and direction required to fill that void.

The Minister for Europe (Peter Hain): I may surprise the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) in the next few minutes. I agree with much of what he said. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) for initiating the debate. He brought to it the considerable expertise that he developed before coming to the House in his role as a senior member of the European Parliament and a respected leader of the Labour group. I am also grateful to the European Scrutiny Committee, of which my hon. Friend is a member, for its excellent report, to which we will soon reply formally.

The suggestion by the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) that we have not been open about our role in the convention could not be further from the truth. This afternoon I shall give evidence on the reform agenda in Europe, the Seville proposals and the work in the convention to the House of Lords Select Committee. Next week I shall give evidence to the European Scrutiny Committee of this House. Both those will be second appearances on that agenda.

Mr. Moore: I do not suggest that the Minister has not made himself available at the right moments. I said that we did not have a specific list of proposals that the House could scrutinise and debate. Have the Government plans for a White Paper on Europe, for example, setting out such proposals?

Peter Hain: We have no anxiety about openness but, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman understands, we are in the early stages of the convention. We are in the process of charting where the land lies and seeing which ideas will gain support. We are therefore reluctant to present at this stage a White Paper or blueprint to assemble coalitions of support—although that is what I seek. However, I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, and we will keep the House continually informed.

The exercise of democratic control goes to the heart of people's concerns about Europe: the idea that its decision-making process is impenetrable and indistinct, and that there are no clear means by which they can influence those decisions, so Europe is something done to them, not by them. The right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Portillo) asserted in The Times last week that the EU was not democratic, and could never become so because it is impossible to create pan-European institutions that people in nation states with such fundamentally differing value systems could respect. I do not accept that. The scale and diversity of the EU undoubtedly present particular challenges but it is as wrong to assert that Europe has no democratic legitimacy as it is to say that we cannot improve on what we have.

Mr. Randall: I feel a bit guilty for interrupting the Minister's flow, but on the subject of democratic deficiency, does he agree that the effective disfranchisement of the people of Gibraltar does not set a good example? Is he confident that they will be able to vote for a Member of the European Parliament by the time of the next European elections?

Peter Hain: Yes.

The EU is a unique and ambitious construct, and has been remarkably successful. It has been a key factor in preserving peace in western Europe for the longest period in the continent's history. It is an engine for jobs, investment and economic growth through the single market. The EU is a force for better environmental protection, and against cross-border crime. Our security, prosperity and quality of life are enhanced enormously by common action on those and other matters.

The hon. Members for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) and for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale rightly referred to enlargement. Both made the important point that extending Europe's boundaries will extend the zone of democracy, stability, peace and respect for human rights. The hon. Member for Uxbridge made telling points about the fact that Portugal and Spain, as modern European democratic nations, are unrecognisable when we think of their history of fascism. The same will apply in due course to Bulgaria and Romania, about which he also made valid points.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would be admitted to the Council of Europe. The intention is that that will happen at the ministerial meeting in November. However, we and others seek further undertakings between now and then on co-operation with the international criminal tribunal for Yugoslavia in The Hague.

The structures that we have set up to deliver on Europe's ambitions are necessarily unique. For people who are used to the decision-making structures of nation states, that is unfamiliar and sometimes uncomfortable. There is, thank goodness, no single Government to elect or throw out, but that does not make the EU undemocratic. I am held to account by the House, as all Ministers in the EU are by their Parliaments. The Commission must regularly account for itself to the European Parliament and the Council of Ministers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly reminded us, that consists of elected Ministers, representing elected Governments. The base of authority is democratic.

The EU's authority also comes from a framework of treaties that have been agreed unanimously by member states' elected Governments, and ratified by their elected Parliaments. The base of democracy is also established in that way. To the extent that the treaty provisions involve pooling of sovereignty, that has been freely accepted by elected representatives in Britain and throughout the EU. The same applies to the supranational institutions that we have established. Successive British Governments and Parliaments have signed up to those not because of a dogmatic commitment to greater European integration, but because each has believed that that was in our national interest.

Let us nail the nonsensical view that it is inherently undemocratic, and peculiar to the EU, to set up unelected institutions with their own powers. The right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea asserted that it was undemocratic of the European Central Bank to set the euro interest rate. However, we granted the Bank of England independence over the sterling interest rate. That has been hugely successful, and has widespread support in the United Kingdom. The principle of ceding control to independent bankers has been accepted; the question is whether they are British or European.

Whether at EU or national level, we need powerful independent bodies to implement policies decided by politicians. The Commission's determination to push through the single market programme has been a key factor in its success. Its rigorous approach to state aids has been crucial to the competitiveness of British companies abroad. The same applies to the European Court of Justice: we need a body that can enforce the obligations that member states enter into.

The basic framework and its institutions are not undemocratic, but the way in which power is exercised within that framework and by those institutions can be much better policed by democratic bodies—a point that has been made throughout the debate.

How can that happen? First, we can have a clearer treaty framework. People feel that the complexity and ambiguity of some of the treaty's provisions are ripe for exploitation. The hon. Member for Uxbridge said that he shied away from the complexities of the EU—a luxury that I do not have. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly that we need to concentrate more on the practical benefits that membership of the EU brings to all our citizens in their daily lives—better job opportunities, greater prosperity, more security from the threats of crime, drug running, human trafficking and terrorism, and higher environmental standards. Air pollution knows no national boundaries. We should speak more about those practical daily life benefits rather than use the continuous Eurospeak that streams out of Brussels.

The convention on the future of Europe is currently considering how to use the treaty to state more clearly what the EU is for and where we want it to act. We also need to be aware of its limits by establishing more clearly what should be done at a European level, and what should be left to member states at national, regional or local level.

Secondly, we need to clarify through our institutional arrangements that elected national Governments accountable to their Parliaments are the principal source of the EU's legitimacy. That means focusing on the European Council and its sectoral Councils, on which elected Ministers sit. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly and the hon. Member for West Suffolk in describing independent nation states as the bedrock of the EU. My hon. Friend in particular provided a good definition of EU members as "independent sovereign states who decide from time to time to pool their sovereignty".

Angus Robertson: While we are talking about independence and sovereignty within Europe, the Minister will be aware of yesterday's article in The Scotsman, which, under the headline "Straw backs Scotland's Euro role", stated:

> "Jack Straw has dropped his opposition to Scotland having more 'independent' influence in Europe".

A source for the Scottish Executive is quoted as saying:

> "Initially, the Foreign Office were hostile, but"

Jack McConnell

> "has now started to win them over. He has got Peter Hain on side and Jack Straw also sees the benefits."

No further details are provided in this story, so will the Minister clarify what independent influence within Europe is envisaged? Will it be direct and automatic representation on the Council of Ministers? Will it allow Scotland to nominate a Commissioner, as independent countries within Europe can? Will it mean a near doubling of MEPs, which a country of 5 million within the EU would have? Will it be real independence within Europe, or is it all a second-rate spin effort by the Scottish Executive and the Westminster Government?

Peter Hain: It is neither independence nor second-rate spin; it is not first-rate spin either, for that matter. That is a straightforward answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

We agreed last month at Seville that heads of Government in the European Council will set an overall strategic agenda and use their four meetings a year to deliver. We must make the sectoral Councils of Government Ministers beneath the European Council much more efficient. At Seville we took a step towards that by reducing the number of Council formations.

The next stage must be to find alternatives to the stop-start effect of the six-monthly rotation of the presidency. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) pointed out, the EU is likely to be 25 strong in a couple of years' time, so each nation is likely to secure the presidency only once every twelve and a half years—hardly much to be pleased about. The six-monthly rotation has worked against developing a strategic agenda and consistency of expertise, as well as a mature relationship with the Commission and Parliament.

We and others have suggested different national presidents for each Council, serving a longer period—perhaps two and a half years, which is half a Commission or European Parliament term—and working together as a team meeting regularly to implement the European Council's strategic agenda under a full-time president elected by heads of Government.

The hon. Member for West Suffolk asked me to spell out how that would enhance democracy. I am happy to do so. It would enhance democracy by creating a much more authoritative and accountable head of Europe who was democratically elected and answerable to elected Governments. That individual would be elected by the heads of Government, and would regularly report to them. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will look at this issue on its merits, rather than in a prejudiced fashion.

One of the problems with Europe is that there is no visible authority that people can identify and hold accountable, so the decisions made in Brussels are not adequately scrutinised. We think that having an elected president of the Council would solve that problem, because that person would be answerable and accountable to elected heads of Government.

The proposal would also answer another demand. I agree with the people who talk about the need for Europe to have a much more prominent global role—for it to be taken more seriously in global affairs, as a force for good. That is important. To achieve that, we must answer the famous Henry Kissinger question, "To whom do I pick up the phone in Europe?" It is not realistic to suggest that one can pick up the phone to a president who serves for six months—or to the President of the European Commission, as some people suggest should be the case—because that individual is not accountable to elected Governments and national Parliaments. We need someone to whom President Bush can pick up the phone when he wants to find out Europe's views. That would enable Europe to play a more authoritative role on the world stage.That person would also ensure that Europe's agenda was driven through the Council more effectively than at present, so that it delivered better for its citizens—a point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly.

Peter Hain: I will give way again shortly, as I am in a generous frame of mind, after I have addressed another issue.

The hon. Member for Uxbridge made an important point—to which the hon. Member for West Suffolk added—about the sensitivities of small countries. We are very alive to that. When the membership of Europe expands to 25 countries, 19 of them will be small countries. Those countries will be in a very powerful position, not least in determining who will be elected to the presidency of the European Council, if a decision with regard to that is eventually taken—by an intergovernmental conference, because that change would require a treaty change.

I have described the team presidency with different sectoral Councils underneath it. Five countries might share those Councils to form a team presidency, which would inevitably have a majority of small countries. It is conceivable that the president will be from a small country, and the arithmetic of the situation would lead to the majority forming the team presidency. Therefore, although the hon. Gentleman is expressing concerns that exist, they can be allayed by that proposal.

Angus Robertson: I am grateful to the Minister for being so generous about interventions.

I am very sympathetic to the case that he is making for more consistency in the Council, but I have a question about how that might work effectively in practice when the different domestic political cycles of member states might make it impossible for somebody to have a full term in the convenership of the Council, or on one of the lower tiers of the Council of Ministers, because people would be elected as individuals rather than representatives of a member state. How would that work effectively?

Peter Hain: We envisage that the job of elected president of the Council would be permanent, and that the post would not occupied by a serving head of Government. Therefore, the president would not be subject to the rise and fall of any particular Administration in any particular country, although he or she would be accountable to elected Governments from time to time, as and when they were formed. With regard to the team presidency, the country concerned would still hold the presidency of, for example, two sectoral Councils.

Mr. Spring: Perhaps I misunderstood what the Minister was saying, but he said that the post would be permanent. He cannot be serious, can he?

Peter Hain: No, it would be for five years. I am sorry; I did not willingly mislead the hon. Gentleman. I thought that I had made myself clear.

Mr. Spring rose—

Peter Hain: I have to make some progress, although I am happy to be open. If I have the time, I will undoubtedly take more interventions.

The proposal has still to be worked through in greater detail, but the idea widely shared by other European Governments, both large and small, is that there should be an individual elected by heads of Governments for five years. That would coincide with the length of service of a Commission or a Parliament, so there would be some continuity.

We need more openness in the Council when it is legislating, and I strongly agree with criticisms in the European Scrutiny Committee's report that meeting in private is both objectionable in principle and makes it much more difficult for national Parliaments to hold Ministers to account. As the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale said, we need more openness. The agreement in Seville to open Council meetings to the public for co-decision dossiers at the beginning and end of the process is a welcome first step.

I hope that we will, in due course, be able to persuade our partners to go further and open up all meetings in which the Council is legislating. We also need to strengthen the role of national Parliaments. Their principal role is, of course, to hold national Governments to account for the decisions that they take in the Council. I believe that the Scrutiny Committee does that well. We are studying the suggestions for improvement in the Scrutiny Committee's report, and will reply formally soon.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly said, national Parliaments should have the collective role of focusing on subsidiarity. The principles of subsidiarity and proportionality are enshrined in the treaty. Europe should act only when it adds value to national action, and when it acts, it should do so as lightly as possible, leaving some flexibility in implementation to member states. However, we have no effective means of enforcing that. Subsidiarity is in principle judicially enforceable, but in practice it is primarily a political judgment about what adds value. I agree with the hon. Member for West Suffolk about that.

We need a political body to police subsidiarity, a body of representatives who will be credible, have a direct link to people, understand and respect national prerogatives, want to safeguard diversity in Europe, and have no vested interest in action at a European level. National parliamentarians fulfil those criteria. It would make a real contribution to democratic legitimacy if there was an ad hoc committee of national parliamentarians who examined the European Union's work programme and relevant proposals critically, and who had powers to make the Commission and Council think again when they were over-legislating. That would combat the sense that European institutions are arrogating ever more power to themselves.

Although the hon. Member for West Suffolk was rather sarcastic about the Prime Minister's original proposals, it was the Prime Minister who put the principle on the agenda, as my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly pointed out. However, I agree that elected politicians, not judges, should be the arbiters on subsidiarity.

The European Parliament also has an important role. To make Europe work, Member states take many decisions by majority vote. That makes it possible for national Ministers to be outvoted, and the powers of national parliamentarians in holding them to account can be limited as a consequence. That is one of several ways in which the European Parliament plays a key role as a further democratic check.

However, there are problems. The electorate needs to understand what the European Parliament does. I agree with my hon. Friend that we need more openness in co-decision, for example, rather than letting the European Parliament have more powers for the sake of it, as he put it. However, I also agree with him that the European Parliament has an important role to play, one of which is summoning Commissioners and questioning them closely about the implementation of the work programme and the use of budgets. We need to find better ways of explaining to the public how that is done.

I do not agree that giving the European Parliament the right to elect the Commission's President would enhance the legitimacy of either institution. The proposals misunderstand the nature of the Commission as an honest and independent broker between different interests. An election of that kind would place the President at the mercy of the largest political group in the Parliament. It is precisely the Commission's independence from day-to-day political interference that is its strength. Holding to account through regular and detailed scrutiny, yes; election, no.

The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale raised interesting ideas about the European constitution. We are open to the idea of a European constitution, which would simplify the structure and establish clarity. There are serious problems associated with incorporating the charter into the treaties wholesale. It is a "motherhood and apple pie" charter, and we must be careful not to undermine our democratic decision-making procedures.

I would be happy to consider scrutiny prior to Councils. However, that would mean that we would have to meet on a Friday, and I do not think that hon. Members would want to do that—

Mr. Alan Hurst (in the Chair): Order. We now come to our next debate, which is on royal finances.

[Dawn Primarolo]

Gentleman's attention to that issue in particular, because, as he rightly said, the debate is not about whether we should have a constitutional monarchy, but about public finances. It is important to draw clear lines between private moneys in the tax system and those assets that are held by the sovereign on behalf of the nation. However, paragraph 9, under the inheritance arrangement, states towards the end that the monarchy as an institution needs sufficient private resources to enable it to continue to perform its traditional role in national life and to have a degree of financial independence from the Government of the day. That principle must be balanced with the principles on which the hon. Gentleman concentrated: transparency and paying tax in the circumstances in which other citizens do.

The basis for the memorandum of understanding is the long-standing rule of statutory construction that statutes do not bind the Crown, including the Queen in her private capacity, unless they are expressly enabled to do so by necessary implications, and legal advice has confirmed that. The arrangements in the memorandum were discussed and agreed between the Government and Her Majesty. At the time the Government said that they welcomed the Queen's and the Prince of Wales's offer to pay tax voluntarily, and that the arrangements in the memorandum were a fair and proportionate way in which to take that into account. In law, the sovereign is not liable to pay unless required explicitly to do so by an Act of Parliament. Given that the sovereign is entitled to the revenues when there is no Duke of Cornwall, Crown exemption applies also to income received by the Prince of Wales from the Duchy of Cornwall.

Since 1993, Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales have paid tax on voluntary arrangements agreed with the Government. That means that most sources of income, such as private investment income money, profit and losses from farming at, say, Sandringham, Balmoral and Windsor, or from opening to the public the houses and gardens at Sandringham and Balmoral, are dealt with in accordance with the usual tax rules. However, the memorandum of understanding includes special arrangements. The hon. Gentleman asked whether income tax is paid at the usual level, and the answer is yes. Capital gains is another example. It is not a negotiable lower rate.

Income tax is paid on all private sources of income. The memorandum of understanding includes provision for calculating the private taxable proportion of the Prince of Wales' income from the Duchy of Cornwall. Tax is also paid on the Queen's privy purse income, which includes income received from the Duchy of Lancaster to the extent that it is used for personal purposes. The hon. Gentleman asked a specific point about that and I shall write to him.

The memorandum of understanding provides for capital gains tax to be paid on gains from the disposal of private assets and on the private proportion of capital gains on the assets of the privy purse. Assets of the Duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall do not belong to the Queen or the Prince of Wales and are not theirs to dispose of. The duchies may sell assets from time to time, but the policy is to apply any proceeds to maintain their capital base for the future. Capital gains are not distributed and, under the terms of the memorandum, there is no capital gains tax in such circumstances. The position is not dissimilar to rollover relief that exists within the system.

As for inheritance tax, the memorandum of understanding recognises the need for assets to pass to successive sovereigns if the monarchy, as an institution, is to continue to play its part in the nation's affairs and to have some financial independence. It therefore provides for assets to pass from one sovereign to another without the payment of inheritance tax, but if the sovereign makes gifts or bequests to another person other than the new sovereign, the normal inheritance tax rules operate as they do for all members of the community. There are no special rules for other members of the royal family. They are fully liable to tax on the same basis as the rest of us.

The hon. Gentleman kindly drew attention to the fact that the civil list annual report has been published for the first time. It now joins the annual reports on grant in aid for the maintenance of occupied royal places and grant in aid for royal air and train travel. Such documents are available for scrutiny. The audit position was endorsed by Ministers as recently as 1998 after consultation with the then leader of Her Majesty's Opposition. That reflects the clear and long-standing bipartisan policy that accounts should not be laid before Parliament, or be subject to national audit scrutiny. However, the accounts are audited in accordance with the high standards of all auditing—and how the money is spent is also thoroughly explained.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the memorandum had been varied in any way in recent years. It might amuse him to learn that minor changes have been made to take account of the introduction of the self-assessment system. Those are the only changes. That reinforces the point that—except in the unique circumstances of transfer from sovereign to sovereign—the usual tax system operates.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about gifts received. He has not yet been given responses to a parliamentary question that he asked about that, and to a parliamentary question on a different matter, and I apologise to him for that. We have not yet received all of the information that he asked for, and we are checking what we have received, but his question will be answered. Gifts received in an official capacity belong to the nation; if Her Majesty receives a gift when she is performing her official role, that belongs to the nation. However, gifts received in a personal capacity are subject to the usual tax rules.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the art collection and, for instance, the use that is made of the revenue from entry fees into the palaces. I have forgotten the name of the charitable trust that was mentioned. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me for that, but I shall write to him about it. There are other relevant issues, such as the exact terms of the holding of the works of art on behalf of the nation, the obligation to maintain them, and the use of those monies to contribute to that.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the surplus in the civil list. He may well have views about whether the agreement of 10 years ago should have been struck, but it was, and it must be honoured. A surplus has arisen, and I understand that it is being used to pay for maintenance of the palaces and public buildings. I believe that the contribution is about £7.5 million, and that the rest is drawn down from the surplus. However, I shall double check all of that to ensure that he receives accurate information.

I come now to the matter of the civil list and annuities. The Queen repays directly to the Treasury—and back into the Consolidated Fund—the annuities for all the members of the royal family, other than those paid to the Duke of Edinburgh in relation to his official duties. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman can see that in all respects—with the exception of the exclusion of inheritance tax due to the unique circumstances of transfer from sovereign to sovereign—the usual rules of the tax system that would be applicable to the rest of us are followed. The provisions with regard to transfer from sovereign to sovereign are a recognition of the role of the monarchy, and they seek to maintain its independence from the Government of the day.

As time is short, I undertake to double check the accuracy of my answers to the hon. Gentleman's questions and, if there are any questions that I have not answered in this brief response, I shall ensure that he receives that information. I am grateful to him for the way that he has pursued this morning's debate, and the straightforward and supportive fashion in which he has genuinely sought information on an area that is of interest to all our citizens who have celebrated the great contribution that Her Majesty the Queen has made to our nation with her and her family in this jubilee year.

Bank Holiday Pay

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North): I am delighted to have the opportunity to raise this important issue on behalf of my constituents and, I believe, thousands of low-paid workers throughout Britain. I have attempted to secure the debate for nine weeks, and I am grateful to the Speaker's Office for allowing me to take a slot that became available due to a cancellation late last week. I apologise because I am full of cold at the moment, so if I break into a coughing fit, please excuse me.

I do not wish to undermine the Labour Governments' great economic achievements since 1997. We have one of the most successful economies in the world, and it would be foolhardy to do so. I am sure that the Chancellor and the Government would not allow me to do that even if I wished. However, it is possible to have both a strong economy and a flexible work force while having good working conditions without exploitation. I hope to convince the Minister that the present balance is wrong and that further attention to legislation is required.

We need stronger employment rights and regulations to protect the most vulnerable members of our communities. The Government are justly proud of their economic performance. We have the lowest levels of unemployment for 30 years and historically low rates of interest and inflation, and we have experienced sustainable growth for five years. Most workers have enjoyed the benefits of our strong economy. They have received increased pay and longer holidays, and experienced better working conditions. Good indicators of the benefits derived from a strong economy include record car sales, more people taking foreign holidays, house prices and restaurant trade.

However, not all workers [illegible] enjoyed the same benefits from our strong economy. [illegible] accept immediately that the introduction of the [illegible] wage and the working families tax credit, in addition to four weeks' holiday entitlement for all employees, have gone a long way towards improving the conditions of some of the lowest paid workers in our country. However, such measures offer only basic employment rights. In my view, British workers are still the poor men of Europe and too many British workers are paid poverty wages. They work long hours in poor working conditions and they enjoy little employment protection.

About three months ago, a constituent contacted me about bank holidays. I ran a story in the local press, and I was amazed to be contacted by several of my constituents, who were mostly such employees as security staff, hairdressers and warehouse men. Nevertheless, several middle managers and management graduates raised issues that affected the way in which they worked and the conditions under which they worked.

We hear much about the need for flexibility, and although a modern nation must have a flexible work force, that should not be used as a guise to undermine basic trade union and employment protection. Examples of exploitation that I shall outline relate to bank holidays. I was amazed to learn from a constituent that we are not automatically entitled to bank holidays. Unlike the rest of Europe, we must negotiate them with our employers. I spoke to several of my colleagues in Parliament who were equally amazed by that. It is not well known that workers are not automatically entitled to bank holidays with pay, and my colleagues were shocked that that is the case in a modern Britain.

[Mr. David Watts]

I was also amazed to find out that workers are often asked to take the four weeks' holiday to which they are now entitled at inappropriate times. I was told about an employer who forced his employees to take their time off in January and February. The argument was that the company had few orders during that period, and it was more convenient for the employer if employees took time off then. That meant that a married man with a family had no holiday entitlement in the summer, so while everyone else was going off on their summer holidays, that gentleman and his family were not able to do so, as he had no control over when he could take his holidays. There was no mutually agreed system; employees had to take holidays when the employer wanted them to.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising this important issue. Is he aware that many of my constituents were obliged to work on the recent jubilee bank holiday, or else come in on the previous Saturday to make up for it? Does he agree that that is absurd in this day and age?

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. I intended to come to that subject at some stage, but he has highlighted the problem.

I found that many people are asked to work unpaid hours. As I come from a trade union background, I did not think that that was acceptable, but several of my constituents tell me that their employers insist that they work extra hours without pay, and they do not even get time off in lieu. The Employment Bill has just come before Parliament, and one of the issues that I ask the Minister to address in it is enforcement. It may be illegal—I think that it probably is—to make people work unpaid hours and not give them time off in lieu, but many people, including middle managers and those in their first graduate jobs, are forced to work extra hours.

I am told that a 50-hour week is not unheard of for those in the retail business who have signed contracts to work 38 hours a week. Those who have come to see me tell me that if they were to try to enforce their employment rights, they would not last two minutes, and they would lack protection. Those people are not in trade unions. As a rule, they will accept overtime without pay.

The use of agency staff is a worry for many people throughout the country. Increasingly, it is the practice for many employers to replace those on permanent contracts with agency staff. Once again, the Employment Bill deals with that, but I should be interested to know what enforcement powers the Government will have.

Finally, I shall mention the way in which many employees are kept in the dark about consultation with their companies. Employees often find themselves made redundant willy-nilly. They do not have any warning, and are not allowed to consider the issues and negotiate with their employers to discuss solutions other than closure or job losses. I understand that that issue, too, is addressed in the Employment Bill. It is crucial that the Government act to protect groups of workers who are vulnerable, and who have no trade union power or skills that would allow them to negotiate good pay and decent conditions of employment.

In addition to the issue of unpaid bank holidays, there is the fact that we are badly treated as far as such holidays are concerned. Germany has 10 to 14 bank holidays, France has 11, Belgium has 10, and Spain and Portugal have 14, but British workers are not automatically entitled to any bank holidays. The number of bank holidays and the protection given to employees as regards payment for them are issues that need to be addressed.

Employment protection needs a serious second look. I know that the Government have done a great deal and I do not want to desecrate the great work that they have done, but without good employment regulation, many of my constituents feel as though they are economic slaves, and that they have no power to influence the decisions of their employer. They believe that they are exploited and abused, and feel that they have little option but to accept the boss's offer, which is often made on a take it or leave it basis. Macho management is still alive and kicking in the United Kingdom. It is not unusual for many of my constituents to be bullied by their employers. People who come from an area of high unemployment are hardly likely to stand up to their bosses if they lose their jobs and cannot find another.

I know that people believe that regulation should not be extended. We often hear the argument that it is anti-competitive, that there are too many Government controls and too much bureaucracy, but such views should be ignored. Frankly, the people who make such claims would not accept the employment conditions faced by many of my constituents. Such people would not accept that they could not take bank holidays off, or poor pay and bad conditions. We should not take any notice of people who set double standards—they want better rights for themselves and their families but not for other people.

It is clear that the present relationship between employer and employee is unbalanced. Without trade union membership or skills, it is difficult for people in my constituency to negotiate decent working conditions. I recommend that people join trade unions. It is interesting that, on average, trade union members get six more bank holidays than workers who are not in trade unions. Once again, there is a benefit in joining a trade union. However, the people that I am talking about are often not in trade unions. They work in small companies where they are easily abused and not given the right wages and conditions.

In many areas in the north-west with high levels of unemployment, there are still some very poor employers. In such cases, the Government should do what they can to protect the workers involved. The Government have made an excellent start with the Employment Bill, but much more must be done to bring about the level of employment protection enjoyed by our European partners. I ask the Government to build on what they have achieved so far. I note—as I have on three occasions now—the benefits that will derive from the new Employment Bill, but there is now a greater need to protect vulnerable workers. The Government have done a great deal on family-friendly policies, but it is not family friendly to be poorly paid, unable to take bank holidays or told to take holidays at inappropriate times.

On the subject of bank holidays, the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) mentioned the jubilee. Some months ago, I was contacted by a constituent whose employer had told him that he would not be paid if he took the jubilee bank holiday off. He described that as like being invited to a party but being told, "Bring your own beer and sandwiches." When the Government announced the jubilee bank holiday, most people thought that they would be able to take part in the celebrations. Sadly, that was not always the case. I hope that when such events take place in the future, people will be able to enjoy the benefits of good bank holidays, pay and conditions.

I hope that the Minister will take my comments on board and address some of the important issues affecting many of my constituents.

1.13 pm

The Minister for Employment Relations, Industry and the Regions (Alan Johnson): It is a delight to serve under your chairmanship for the first time, Mr. Hurst. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts)—who is with us courtesy of Nurofen—on raising the issue of bank holidays. He has consistently raised and championed this issue, and if the day ever comes when we do provide statutory pay for bank holidays, we should call it Watts payments day in recognition of his efforts.

The gist of the argument was put by my hon. Friend, but I approach it from a different perspective. We cannot isolate the issue of bank holidays from all the other protections being provided for workers in this country. He mentioned that, despite our good record, we were the poor relation in Europe. I do not agree with that description. It is true that every country in the European Union pays for some bank holidays, but not all. For example, France does not have statutory provision for payment for all its bank holidays, and if we look more widely at non-European Union G7 countries, we find the same picture.

The question in the United Kingdom is where we set the priorities. My hon. Friend, when making the argument that we are the poor relation in Europe—a notion that I hope to disabuse him of in my contribution—also mentioned that he is a trade unionist. Like me, he will recall that unlike every other European Union country, the trade union movement in this country opposed right up until the 1980s the implementation of minimum standards through the law. It opposed a national minimum wage, concepts such as the working time directive and the right to paid holidays. Like me, he will remember that, when we wore our flares and tank tops, the argument in the UK trade union movement was that those matters should be settled through free collective bargaining, that there should be no state interference in them and that civil rights at work came with the union card.

I make those points because we must put this matter in context. It is true that when we came into power in 1997 there were more bank holidays in the rest of the European Union than in the UK, and that more of them were paid. However, we also had then no national minimum wage and no entitlement to paid holidays or a union recognition procedure. In many areas, there was no protection. It was then, as now, questionable whether bank holidays should be placed further up our list of priorities.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Employment Bill. I am delighted to announce that that is now the Employment Act as it received Royal Assent at 10.25 pm last night. That will affect some of the points that my hon. Friend raised about his constituents. The Employment Act will affect individuals who felt unable to raise those grievances in the workplace, because it insists that every workplace in the country, irrespective of how many people it employs, whether that is one or 1,000, must have a statutory grievance and discipline procedure as part of the protection available.

It is illegal for workers to receive no money for extra hours, not just in civil law but in criminal law because it breaches the national minimum wage. We have not only set a national minimum wage and uprated it this morning by statutory instrument, but set up a helpline whereby the Inland Revenue—which strikes fear into the hearts of everyone, not only employers, and has cruel and unusual punishments—will pursue a case such as that described by my hon. Friend, without the employee having to approach the employer at all. Employees can ring the helpline and the rest is done for them. We have found that compliance with the national minimum wage has increased dramatically from its early days, April 1999.

As well as providing the protection for constituents that my hon. Friend mentioned, we are now ahead of most countries in Europe—in the top three—on paid maternity leave. We have uprated statutory maternity pay by 60 per cent., the largest increase since 1948.

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend says that if someone is being asked to work longer hours than stated in their contract, they can take action by reporting that to the Inland Revenue. I want to be clear about something. If a contract says, as I understand that they often do, that someone is required to work 38 hours a week but will have to be flexible, does that element of flexibility include that person being asked to work long beyond the 38 hours? How would that be enforced? What kind of contractual arrangements deal with that, bearing in mind that we are often dealing with people who are unorganised, who are not in trade unions and who have little individual power?

Alan Johnson: I was referring to people being asked to work for no hourly rate, for nothing. Yes, there can be flexibility of hours, but there are no circumstances that I am aware of in which anyone can be asked to work those hours for no remuneration whatever.

I shall check on the other points that my hon. Friend made, and perhaps write to him about the protection on hours. We have, of course, an opt-out from the working time directive, and we are the only country in the European Union to do so, but the onus is on the individual; if they wish to work more than 48 hours, they can sign the opt-out. Protection does exist, and the introduction of the Employment Act 2002 means that

Parliament who were equally amazed by that. It is not well known that workers are not automatically entitled to bank holidays with pay, and my colleagues were shocked that that is the case in a modern Britain.

I was also amazed to find out that workers are often asked to take the four weeks' holiday to which they are now entitled at inappropriate times. I was told about an employer who forced his employees to take their time off in January and February. The argument was that the company had few orders during that period, and it was more convenient for the employer if employees took time off then. That meant that a married man with a family had no holiday entitlement in the summer, so while everyone else was going off on their summer holidays, that gentleman and his family were not able to do so, as he had no control over when he could take his holidays. There was no mutually agreed system; employees had to take holidays when the employer wanted them to.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising this important issue. Is he aware that many of my constituents were obliged to work on the recent jubilee bank holiday, or else come in on the previous Saturday to make up for it? Does he agree that that is absurd in this day and age?

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. I intended to come to that subject at some stage, but he has highlighted the problem.

I found that many people are asked to work unpaid hours. As I come from a trade union background, I did not think that that was acceptable, but several of my constituents tell me that their employers insist that they work extra hours without pay, and they do not even get time off in lieu. The Employment Bill has just come before Parliament, and one of the issues that I ask the Minister to address in it is enforcement. It may be illegal—I think that it probably is—to make people work unpaid hours and not give them time off in lieu, but many people, including middle managers and those in their first graduate jobs, are forced to work extra hours.

I am told that a 50-hour week is not unheard of for those in the retail business who have signed contracts to work 38 hours a week. Those who have come to see me tell me that if they were to try to enforce their employment rights, they would not last two minutes, and they would lack protection. Those people are not in trade unions. As a rule, they will accept overtime without pay.

The use of agency staff is a worry for many people throughout the country. Increasingly, it is the practice for many employers to replace those on permanent contracts with agency staff. Once again, the Employment Bill deals with that, but I should be interested to know what enforcement powers the Government will have.

Finally, I shall mention the way in which many employees are kept in the dark about consultation with their companies. Employees often find themselves made redundant willy-nilly. They do not have any warning, and are not allowed to consider the issues and negotiate with their employers to discuss solutions other than closure or job losses. I understand that that issue, too, is addressed in the Employment Bill. It is crucial that the Government act to protect groups of workers who are vulnerable, and who have no trade union power or skills that would allow them to negotiate good pay and decent conditions of employment.

In addition to the issue of unpaid bank holidays, there is the fact that we are badly treated as far as such holidays are concerned. Germany has 10 to 14 bank holidays, France has 11, Belgium has 10, and Spain and Portugal have 14, but British workers are not automatically entitled to any bank holidays. The number of bank holidays and the protection given to employees as regards payment for them are issues that need to be addressed.

Employment protection needs a serious second look. I know that the Government have done a great deal and I do not want to desecrate the great work that they have done, but without good employment regulation, many of my constituents feel as though they are economic slaves, and that they have no power to influence the decisions of their employer. They believe that they are exploited and abused, and feel that they have little option but to accept the boss's offer, which is often made on a take it or leave it basis. Macho management is still alive and kicking in the United Kingdom. It is not unusual for many of my constituents to be bullied by their employers. People who come from an area of high unemployment are hardly likely to stand up to their bosses if they lose their jobs and cannot find another.

I know that people believe that regulation should not be extended. We often hear the argument that it is anti-competitive, that there are too many Government controls and too much bureaucracy, but such views should be ignored. Frankly, the people who make such claims would not accept the employment conditions faced by many of my constituents. Such people would not accept that they could not take bank holidays off, or poor pay and bad conditions. We should not take any notice of people who set double standards—they want better rights for themselves and their families but not for other people.

It is clear that the present relationship between employer and employee is unbalanced. we are well ahead of Europe on matters such as the right to be accompanied; any worker for any size of company in this country can be accompanied by a trade unionist, whether their union is recognised or not, at any discipline or grievance case. That is not mirrored elsewhere in Europe. We are well ahead of the game.

We are also introducing statutory paternity pay and paid adoption leave for the first time. Other measures include the extension of union learning representatives, and the right to paid time off and facilities. My hon. Friend said that we are the poor relation in Europe, but he should consider where we stand following five years of various pieces of employment legislation and now the Employment Act.

My hon. Friend said that people were not informed and consulted. I remember a particular case in his constituency that he came to see me about, which is now being addressed with the implementation of the information and consultation directive. In response to the idea that we are the poor relation in Europe, I say that over the next few years workers will have the right not only to a discipline and grievance procedure in their workplace, to a minimum wage, to paid holidays, to be accompanied, and to various other measures, but to request flexible working if they are the mother or father of a child up to six years old.

The workplace up to 2010—the measures will be introduced at various stages—will be very different. We will outlaw discrimination on grounds of age, sexual orientation, religion and disability.

Mr. Alan Hurst (in the Chair): Order. I am sure that the Minister is aware that he is covering a broad sweep. The subject under debate is bank holiday pay.

Alan Johnson: Absolutely, Mr. Hurst. I accept that it is a broad sweep, but I am replying to the allegation that we are the poor relation in Europe.

The first question is where we place our priorities. Secondly, we must consider the cost that businesses, particularly small businesses, would be asked to bear as a result of the measures. Many businesses complain about an incremental stacking up of costs. We have sought to introduce the measures in a way that takes businesses with us into the brave new world of minimum employment standards in the workplace.

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend makes the point that some employers would object to the introduction of statutory paid bank holidays. I have been in contact with small employers who very much resent the fact that those whom they regard as poor employers are competing alongside them without providing decent conditions, pay or holiday entitlement. Does he agree that that can have an anti-competitive effect?

Alan Johnson: I do agree. I am not saying that the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend are not legitimate or pertinent. We estimate that about 17 per cent. of full-time and part-time workers are not paid for bank holidays, so 83 per cent. are paid. As my hon. Friend knows, the Bank Holidays Act 1871 has remained virtually unchanged. It was revoked and reintroduced in 1971, but for 131 years of our history the situation has been has it is now: bank holidays, whether paid or not, are a contractual matter between employee and employer.

Mr. Laws: Does the Minister agree that now would be a good time to review people's entitlement to bank holidays? Does he not understand that many people find it surprising that a Labour Government could defend a situation in which the worst employers can exploit some of the most vulnerable employees in the labour market?

Alan Johnson: I hope to answer the point about this being a good time when I come to my feeble peroration.

Labour Governments under Ramsay MacDonald, Clement Attlee, Harold Wilson and Jim Callaghan did not address such issues in any way. They did not introduce a national minimum wage or a right to four weeks' paid holiday, whereas this Government have.

We have not as yet addressed the important points raised about bank holidays, which have a 131-year history. The cost of the Employment Act 2002, as Opposition Members pointed out during its passage, is considerable, and my hon. Friend talked about not just paying for bank holidays, but increasing their number. A TUC paper in August 2001 suggested that we increase the number of bank holidays by three. Taken together, that would mean a cost to business of £6.5 billion a year.

I do not think that there would be any disagreement between us on the fact that many workers have to work on bank holidays, whether they are in the health service, in transport or, increasingly, in tourism, when we as consumers insist that there are facilities for us on bank holidays and where most of the costs fall on small businesses that are seeking to recover after foot and mouth disease.

We have to consider the question proportionately in terms of where the cost would fall and where it would stand in our priorities. We are probably a rather curmudgeonly and miserable nation in the days that we allow for celebrations, but in the rest of the EU the bank holidays exist for a reason. They were not just created because someone in France said, "We have two fewer bank holidays than in Germany—let's create a couple." Days such as Bastille day exist for historical reasons. The last time that happened was when a Labour Government introduced the May day bank holiday. There has to be a reason for the nation to celebrate; I do not think that one can manufacture a reason for a bank holiday, although we have done so, most recently for the Queen's golden jubilee, and we did so for the royal wedding in 1981, and there have been a couple of other occasions where there have been one-off bank holidays.

We estimate that it would cost £500 million if existing bank holidays were paid, given that we are talking only about 17 per cent. of the work force, but that is in the context of all the other changes that we are making. There is bound to be a cost [illegible] information and consultation, tackling age discrimination in the workplace, the worker versus employer argument that we are consulting on at the moment and all the other measures that we have in our exciting and rather full agenda during the next few years. Would we make this matter a priority in that debate?

Mr. Watts: Many of my constituents would say that many measures that we have introduced are aimed at people who are well organised, from the middle classes and who can afford to represent themselves. We are not addressing the basic, fundamental conditions of employment, such as bank holidays and time off. There is a view that our priorities are wrong, and we need to refocus on some of those issues.

Alan Johnson: I accept that, from the correspondence that I have received from my hon. Friend and others, this may be becoming a higher priority for workers and constituents. I think that he would accept that it was not the highest priority in 1997. We are still only five years into this brave new world.

We have a practical consideration. We have to consider those people who have to work on bank holidays and what they would be paid. Would it be a day in lieu? Would it be one of the things that I used to negotiate as a trade union leader: time and a half and a day off, or double time and a half? That creates practical problems. Generally, the most positive thing that I can say is that I would not rule out a review on the status and structure of bank holidays in the future. It is not an issue that is at the forefront of our employment legislative programme, but it is important, and one that we shall look at perhaps in our third or fourth term of government.

Contracted Care Workers

1.29 pm

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I am delighted to have the opportunity to initiate the debate for two reasons. The first is to press the Government to introduce a long-delayed reform that they have been promising for some years but which has failed, inexplicably, to materialise. Secondly, I hope that the Minister will use his response to give some reassurance and to promise some recompense to one of my constituents, who faces severe personal financial strain because the reforms are not yet in place. Indeed, my constituent's clients face the prospect of losing the services that the business supplies and perhaps even of ending up as more of the hospital bed blockers whose numbers the Government rightly are determined to reduce.

Mr. Alan Hurst (in the Chair): Order. I remind hon. Members of the words of the Speaker as to dress in the Chamber. For that purpose, Westminster Hall should be treated in the same way as the Chamber.

Mr. Rendel: Let me start by describing my constituent's case and then I shall fit it into the wider picture of desperately needed Government reform, which has been so long delayed. My constituent, Mrs. Angela Reed, runs her own business providing infirm and disabled people with care, much of it of a medical nature, in their own homes. She trades in her own name as a sole proprietor and employs staff to assist her in the provision of services. Like others working in the field, she provides valued services, often on behalf of the local authority, to some of the most vulnerable people in our community and, because the services are provided in the home, they maximise the independence of the individuals concerned.

Given that the Minister is doubtless a proponent of joined-up government, this seems an ideal opportunity to remind him and his colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry of the words of the Department of Health's 1998 White Paper "Modernising Social Services", which stated that > "when people need social services help, that help will be arranged in a way that lets them do as much as possible for themselves; and allows them wherever possible to live in their own homes."

The type of care provided by Mrs. Reed is VAT exempt if it is provided by or supervised by a medically qualified person such as a nurse or doctor. Since the beginning of the year, Mrs. Reed has employed medically qualified staff in a supervisory capacity. However, that was not the case earlier, so her services did not fall under the statutory VAT exemption, despite the fact that they were often recommended by medical practitioners who knew of her great and long experience in providing such services.

Accordingly, when it emerged that her turnover had exceeded the VAT registration threshold in early 2001, she was obliged to commence charging VAT to her clients, the elderly people who benefited from and were happy with her care services, which they desperately needed if they were to be able to remain in their own homes, but which many of them could afford only with difficulty. Many were unable or unwilling to pay the extra amount, and custom was lost as a result.

[Mr. Rendel]

Moreover, because it was not immediately apparent that she had exceeded the threshold, Mrs. Reed faces retrospective registration and VAT payments amounting to approximately £10,000. The situation has placed her and her business under considerable strain. Mrs. Reed's accountants—James and Cowper, a local firm—have been in correspondence with Customs and Excise in the hope of persuading it that the VAT exemption should apply in her circumstances. They have not been successful. I shall not argue today that that is an incorrect interpretation of the legal position, but there is a strong case for arguing that the situation conflicts with stated Government principles and policy.

I come to the general position to prove my point. If Mrs. Reed operated as an agency, not a proprietorial business, to provide the services of her staff, she would be in a much more favourable position in relation to VAT. Agencies are not regarded as supplying the full service of the staff whom they place, so VAT is due only on their placement commission. That is due to change. The Department of Trade and Industry proposes to change the status of workers placed by such agencies so that they will become full employees of the agency. The contractual relationship will therefore be with the bureau or agency that supplies them, not with the client who hires them. However, there has been a severe delay in implementation. Changes to the employment status of temporary workers supplied by employment bureaux were first announced more than three and a half years ago in September 1998. Eight months after that, on 31 May 1999, a consultation document entitled "Regulation of the Private Recruitment Industry" was published. In its business brief 13/99, dated 18 June 1999, Customs and Excise indicated that the regulations were expected to come into force at the beginning of 2000.

In an Adjournment debate on 29 October 1999, my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) and others expressed the concern that the changes would increase the amount of VAT charged to people buying care in their homes, some of whom are often the most vulnerable members of our society, as hon. Members said. In another business brief 3/2000, dated 22 February 2000, Customs and Excise reported that there would be an extra-statutory concession for home care services. The brief makes it clear that the main reason for the concession was that Customs and Excise and the DTI recognised that the changes would > "place an increased VAT burden on some of the most vulnerable people in society".

The concession

> "will be introduced to coincide with the introduction of the DTI changes in the Summer."

The summer of 2000 has come and gone, and two years and a general election later we are still waiting. The extra-statutory concession will be welcome when it is introduced. Business brief 3/2000 makes it clear that the concession will apply to non-agency care providers, such as my constituent. It will also apply to home care services, including personal care such as bathing, and help with practical tasks such as house cleaning where there is an obvious client need.

As the Paymaster General, in a written parliamentary answer on 29 January 2001 in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam) said:

> "Customs will implement the Extra Statutory Concession to coincide with the changes in the Department of Trade and Industry regulations on the private recruitment industry. A side effect of these changes could have been an increase in the VAT paid for necessary home care provided by employment bureaux. The concession will mean that the VAT burden on those least able to look after themselves is not increased as a result of the DTI changes, and in many cases will actually go down."—[Official Report, 29 January 2001; Vol. 362, c. 39-40W.]

I welcome the Government's clear statement of intent, and their commitment to ensure that there is no inequity of treatment on VAT between agencies and proprietorial businesses providing similar services in competition with one another. However, will the Minister account for the extraordinary delay in implementing the proposals? Hon. Members will note that the Paymaster General's parliamentary answer is dated one year after the announcement of the extra-statutory concession. Why have those changes still not come into effect?

In another written parliamentary answer, dated 25 January 2001, my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam asked the Secretary of State for Health > what discussions he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the implementation of the proposed extra-statutory concession on VAT and home care; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State at the Department of Health replied:

> "The Department has been liaising closely with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Department of Trade and Industry on their proposals since 1997. The proposed Value Added Tax concession will mean that people receiving care in their own homes will not pay VAT on the wages element of that care. We will continue to make every effort to promote home care as a choice for individuals in need of support." —[Official Report, 25 January 2001; Vol. 361, c. 689-90W.]

Therefore, this matter has been under discussion since 1997. The Government are committed to promoting home care as an option for the individuals concerned, but no action has been taken for five years.

One year further on and the Treasury was repeating the same mantra. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer

> "when he expects Customs and Excise to issue details of the proposed extra statutory concession in respect of VAT on supply of services agency workers for domiciliary care."

The Financial Secretary replied:

> "Details of the proposed extra statutory concession on the VAT liability of home care will be available when the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry lays before Parliament revised regulations governing the conduct of the private recruitment industry."—[Official Report, 25 January 2002; Vol. 378, c. 1150W.]

So details will be announced when they are announced. That is very helpful.

If the new regulations had been introduced in the summer of 2000, the timing initially announced by Customs and Excise, my constituent would not be in the position she is in now. This is not simply a case of a particular business reporting a grievance to the local Member of Parliament and calling for a change in the law. This is a case where the Government have been promising to change the law for several years, but have failed to fulfil that promise, to the great disadvantage of my constituent.

I hope that the Minister will today be able to announce when those changes will be introduced. Meanwhile the delay has had severe consequences for my constituent and her business. Her business provides important care services for many elderly people, in keeping with the principle of independent living, which is rightly at the heart of the Government's thinking on social care. Under those circumstances, can the Minister provide an assurance that the needs of care providers who have fallen foul of the existing VAT regulations will be taken into account when the expected reforms are finally announced?

Given that my constituent would never have got into her present financial difficulty had the Government brought in the relevant legislation according to their original timetable, it seems only fair that the retrospective VAT that my constituent is now being asked to pay is either waived or counterbalanced by a compensation payment to her of the same size paid on the grounds of the Government's maladministration of their own legislative programme. The local council and the local medical services value my constituent's work, and so, very much so, do her clients. The Government's policy, quite rightly, is to enable people to obtain the care they need to remain in their own homes. It is also the Government's policy therefore that VAT should not be charged on the provision of home care services. For the sake of my constituent, but above all for the sake of her clients, she should not have a VAT bill to pay, just because the Government have failed, after five years of waiting, to get their act together.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I congratulate the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) on securing the debate on such an important issue. It is a reflection of his strong track record in the House. He speaks up on such issues both in policy terms and to make active representations on behalf of his constituents, including individuals who are sometimes affected by residential care matters. The constituent in this case has been affected as a provider of services to people in their own homes.

The hon. Gentleman raised some important matters, and I am glad of the opportunity to reply, because improving the standard of care for elderly people in care homes and their own homes is a priority for this Government. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the national service framework for older people, which was published last year, is a significant step forward. With the new National Care Standards Commission now being merged with the social services inspectorate, an important element of protection and consistency for elderly people, many of whom are very vulnerable, has been introduced into the system.

The hon. Gentleman will also know about the significant additional spending that the Government have put into personal social services. It is available to support the services to take care of people in their own homes and in residential care homes. Nationally, resources have increased on average in real terms by 3 per cent. a year between 1996-97 and the current year. In addition, as we recently announced, the real terms increase between 2003-04 and 2005-06 will be the equivalent of 6 per cent. per year. That is in stark contrast to the record of the previous Government, who between 1992 and 1997 oversaw a real term's annual growth of 0.1 per cent. It is an important context for what will be a more technical discussion.

The Government are keen to see initiatives for the development of not only better standards in care homes but intermediate care services of rehabilitation and support, which can increase individuals' independence and help them remain in their own homes and out of institutionalised care homes for longer. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's greeting for our proposals for an extra-statutory concession, and it may be helpful to give some background detail to our decision to introduce it. I will then explain why I dispute his contention that there has been a long delay in the introduction of the measure per se, by explaining its crucial link to the proposals for amending Department of Trade and Industry regulations for governing the activities of employment agencies.

The activities, nature and regulation of employment agencies and bureaux are at the heart of the proposal to introduce an extra-statutory concession. At present, employment bureaux can arrange their affairs for VAT purposes so that they act as either an agent or a principal in supplying staff. The hon. Gentleman touched on that point. For the sake of clarity, an agent is someone who makes arrangements for the supply of goods and services by another person. When care services are arranged through an agent, even though one invoice and charge may be raised, there are two distinct supplies: the agent's services—the making of arrangements for the supply by someone else, such as a self-employed worker—and the care service itself, which is supplied by the worker.

As in the case of Mrs. Reed in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, who had to make a choice as part of setting up and running her business, personal businesses must choose either to use an agent to arrange for the supply of an exempt service on their behalf or to act as a principal. A principal is a person who makes or receives a supply, so when an employment bureau is a principal, for VAT purposes it is akin to an employer of staff in that it is responsible for providing the services carried out by them. A principal does not therefore merely make arrangements for the supply of a third party, but supplies the services carried out by its staff.

The introduction of the extra-statutory concession is crucially linked to the proposals that were produced by Government and led by the Department of Trade and Industry and which, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, were published in 1999. The amendments and reform of the regulation of the private recruitment industry were aimed at providing employee protection to temporary workers supplied by employment bureaux. It was thought that a side effect of those changes would be that employment bureaux acting as agents, which previously had to charge VAT only for the service of making arrangements, would have to charge VAT on their total fee, including the agency worker's salary costs. Following close scrutiny by the Treasury and on the Chancellor's initiative, we investigated ways of minimising the potential VAT impact of the DTI's proposed changes on home care services so that people in their own homes were not faced with increased VAT payments—hence the extra-statutory concession.

The concession means that when the new DTI regulations come into effect, people in their own homes who are in need of care will not pay VAT on the wages element of taxable care. The arrangement fee will, however, remain taxable in the same way. The hon. Gentleman quoted correctly our intention of introducing the concession to coincide with the DTI regulations. The DTI is considering the many responses to its consultation document. As the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, several complex issues—not least the tax dimensions—are connected with the proposed changes. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will regard what he rightly described as our "clear statement of intent" as our determination to introduce an extra-statutory concession when the regulations are introduced and for the purpose that I explained earlier.

There is therefore no sinister reason for the delay in introducing the extra-statutory concession; the matter is perfectly simple. We announced that we would introduce the concession when the DTI regulations are laid before Parliament and that position remains. The concession is being introduced to offset the danger that people who purchase care that enables them to continue to live in their own homes will be liable for extra VAT, particularly on the costs of the care services and the relevant worker salaries. I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that our statement of intent in that regard remains clear and strong.

Mr. Rendel: I quite believe the Minister and the Government when they say that they will introduce that concession when the DTI changes its rules. The danger for people like my constituent is not that they might be charged VAT and have to pass that charge on to their clients because they already have to do so as they are not bureaux and agencies that work in the way that will be affected by the DTI change. They have to charge VAT now and their clients already have to suffer, and they will go on doing so because the longer the DTI takes to make its changes, the longer it will take for the extra-statutory concession to come in—unless the Minister can do something about it straight away.

John Healey: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point but if my memory serves—I will check the Official Report—he said that Mrs. Reed had altered the way in which she provides her services and that they are now supervised by a nurse. The key element for the provision of care is therefore not liable to VAT, although the commissioning or arrangement fee still is, as I have explained. The hon. Gentleman will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that that is, understandably, the position that Mrs. Reed has taken.

Mr. Rendel: The Minister is right that, because Mrs. Reed changed her arrangements, she has got round the problem. However, there will be other people throughout the country who are still providing services directly, without medical supervision. Mrs. Reed has had to employ people deliberately to get round the VAT problem, which seems an absurd way to do it.

John Healey: We concur at least on the way in which Mrs. Reed organises her business. It is a quite sensible adaptation to the provision of services. Clearly, the quality of services that she offers to people living in their own home cannot be reduced or damaged by the involvement of a qualified nurse.

We are discussing the territory of VAT in care services, and the hon. Gentleman has made a number of powerful points. I hope that he at least recognises that the Government are aware of the impact that VAT can have on care services and vulnerable or sick people, both in their own home and in care homes.

VAT is not chargeable on care services that form part of the care or treatment of a person in a nursing or similar residential home. That includes care provided by staff employed by the institution, and care provided by contracted staff. Nor is VAT chargeable on medical, personal or nursing care services provided or supervised by a nurse, whether they be provided in a nursing home, another home or someone's own home. We have just discussed that point. VAT is not chargeable on any welfare service, including care services, in a residential home or at a home that is provided by a charity or a local authority under a statutory duty. Mrs. Reed is clearly running an agency that is a business. She now delivers such services under the supervision of a nurse, so the workers' salaries are not subject to VAT.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are constrained to some degree by long-standing agreements with our European partners. The United Kingdom can maintain existing VAT zero rates and exemptions but, under the same Community agreements, we may not introduce new reliefs or make anything more than marginal adjustments to existing reliefs. Currently, there is no exemption for the services of employment bureaux, so there is a significant constraint on our ability to reduce the VAT chargeable on the arrangement fees or commission services of agencies such as that of the hon. Gentleman's constituent. Clearly, it would be more than a marginal adjustment to try to shoehorn such an exemption into an existing relief.

That does not mean, however, that we can do nothing in this sector. Indeed, I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that we moved rapidly in March when a High Court judgment on VAT and residential care threatened to limit the exemption for residential care. We immediately put VAT exemption beyond question through the Value Added Tax (Health and Welfare) Order, which was statutory instrument No. 762/2002. I hope that the hon. Gentleman sees that as evidence of decisive and prompt action to confirm that vulnerable people will not face VAT on residential care. We are determined to ensure that vulnerable people do not face a greater VAT burden than is absolutely necessary.

I end by confirming the timing of the extra-statutory concession, as the hon. Gentleman requested. We still intend to introduce the concession immediately the new Department of Trade and Industry regulations are laid. I cannot, however, assure him on the retrospectivity that he seeks on the VAT payable by people such as his constituent at present. I hope that he feels that this short debate has been valuable. Our general approach to social care is that we are committed to increasing the level of funding, and determined to raise standards of care and to ensure that tax, as a proportion of costs, plays no greater part than is necessary.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Caplin.]

9.30 am

Claire Ward (Watford): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister established the social exclusion unit because he recognised the clear link between the lack of housing, opportunity and education and the high levels of poverty suffered by some people in our society and the degree of crime and lawlessness. I want to draw attention to those people who are among the most socially excluded in our society—girls and young women from disadvantaged, deprived and depressed environments who become victims under our criminal justice system. I do not condone the crimes that they commit, be they shoplifting, robbery or serious assault, or query why they are being punished, but I question the response of a criminal justice system that takes vulnerable children—as many of them are—and puts them in prison, which cannot possibly meet their needs or help them to build a better life.

We will always need prisons. It is right that society should be able to remove the freedom of those who commit serious crimes, as a punishment and to protect the public from harm. However, wherever possible, prison must also offer offenders the chance to be rehabilitated back into the community. The concept of rehabilitation is all the more important when the offender is only 15 or 16 years of age, having committed a crime perhaps a year earlier. Such young people have their lives ahead of them and, with help and guidance, they may become good and valuable citizens in our community. Without that guidance, however, they may spiral further into the depths of lawlessness.

It is particularly important to consider the needs of young women and girls within the criminal justice system and distinguish them from the needs of male prisoners. Females are less likely to commit crime than men and when they do, their crimes tend to be less violent and they are less likely to be a risk to the general public. For example, many of the assaults committed by women are on people they know and are often a reaction to having suffered prolonged periods of sexual or physical abuse. That is not an excuse for the crime, but we must understand the motives and the difference between those crimes and violent crimes committed by men.

The state has provided a limited number of penal establishments for women because so few women, especially young girls, commit crimes that require custodial sentences. Consequently, women prisoners tend to end up further away from their families and homes than male prisoners. They suffer much greater isolation in custody because access to their families may be more restricted. It is worth noting that more than half of the women in our prisons have children, who are often left behind when their main carer is taken into custody.

Women prisoners tend to display more symptoms of depression and mental health problems. Many suffer from mental illness. Self harm or cutting up is fairly common among women prisoners, but few prisons can cope with it. Such women need help, not incarceration. Their crimes are often the result of their mental instability. In addition to mental health problems, women prisoners show high levels of drink and drug dependency.

Ann Owers, the chief inspector of prisons, suggested in her recent report that a crisis is brewing because of the lack of capacity and poor standards in women's prisons. The Youth Justice Board designated 12 places at Eastwood Park prison to hold girls under 18 years of age. Inspectors describe that prison as an establishment in crisis. In one month, there had been 47 cases of self harm and more than 50 cases of people having been identified as at risk from suicide. Despite the commitment and dedication of the staff, few were qualified to deal with young girls or with the high levels of mental illness and vulnerability that are so common in women's prisons. The chief inspector commented that the fact that the number of those prisoners was increasing was nothing short of scandalous. Although designated to hold 12 girls, Eastwood Park had 14 girls in its care in March this year. Although the numbers fluctuate, it is frequently overcrowded. Girls are then accommodated with adults, which is a clear breach of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child and, in all likelihood, unlawful in English law following the Flood judgment.

The inspectors met all 12 girls under the age of 18 at Eastwood Park and concluded:

> "It was impossible not to be struck by the profound personality disturbance and mental health problems that many presented and by the inappropriateness of prison, or indeed any other custodial placement for them."

Eastwood Park is not the only prison taking more young girls than it can properly accommodate. On Monday, I visited Bullwood Hall in Essex—a women's prison and young offenders institution. The Youth Justice Board funds 28 places at Bullwood Hall for girls aged 15 to 18. However, the governor confirmed this week that, due to increased demand, he had unlocked 50 units and was now accommodating 22 more juveniles. Consequently, some of the young girls will be accommodated on wings with adults over 18 where prison officers may not have the experience or training to deal with vulnerable juveniles.

Holloway prison has no operational capacity for juveniles, but last Friday it was accommodating seven sentenced girls and another six on remand—further evidence that our prison system is ill-prepared for the increasing number of young girls being imprisoned by our courts.

I was impressed by the commitment of the staff and the governor of Bullwood Hall. They try to provide the best possible environment for the juveniles within the limits of their funding and the power that they have. However, it does not matter how committed and genuine the prison staff are if the environment is unsuitable for young girls.

[Claire Ward]

I had the opportunity to talk to some of the girls during my visit, and what struck me most was the common thread that ran through each of their lives. Miss A is 16 years old. She spent the first few days of her sentence in Holloway prison, which she described as disgusting—a view shared by all the girls that I met. Bullwood Hall is keen to take girls who have been sentenced straight from court. Unfortunately, they often spend the first few days in the adult women's prison in Holloway, in which the regime is extremely harsh and where the conditions are especially difficult for those serving their first prison sentence.

Having been moved to Bullwood Hall, Miss A. was understandably missing her family. Her mother is trying to raise the other children, does not drive, and is unable to fund the cost of travel by train to visit her due to low income. The isolation from their families that prisoners experience makes it difficult to maintain close contact. Although many of the girls at Bullwood Hall come from London and the home counties, some come from as far away as Liverpool or Manchester. Some come from Wales, which has no women's prisons. It is no wonder that their families find it difficult to keep in touch.

For many of the young girls, however, home is the last place that they should or could be. Miss B., for example, is also 16. Her father is in prison and her mother, who suffers from depression and alcohol dependency, is being evicted. Miss B. does not see her family and found it difficult to cope when she first arrived at Bullwood Hall. Officers tried to explain the procedures and rules to her and she was given an information booklet, but with her limited education—she was expelled from school—she admits to not understanding much of it. She told me that being left to cry alone in her cell on those first few nights was horrible.

Miss B. described her daily routine, which included being locked in a cell from 8.15 pm to 8 am and having to ask permission to go to the toilet during the night. When she is finally discharged, the accommodation arranged for her by the probation service will be crucial to her ability to escape the life that she has led so far. Her most striking observations of prison life were about what she had witnessed—girls of her own age on hard drugs such as crack cocaine and heroin, which she had never seen before. She had gained a new knowledge of drugs and other crimes. Girls would relate stories of offences that they had committed and for which they had not been caught, which suggested that it was possible to commit a crime and get away with it. Further exposure to crime was not helping the girl, but expanding her knowledge of crime.

All the girls said that being away from their family and friends was the hardest part to endure. However, questioning revealed that some of them could not return to their families on release. They also knew that if there was to be a chance of their leading a better life, they had to be away from the neighbourhood and environment that had influenced their criminal behaviour in the past.

Many of the girls have received little guidance in their young lives. Their parents have not set boundaries, and they have not been allowed to grow up with the rules that most of us accept as fundamental to the structure of our lives. As one girl said, she found it hard in prison because, "I am not used to people telling me what to do. I am used to doing what I want."

Many of the girls are first offenders. Their crime may be sufficiently serious to warrant detention, but evidence suggests that courts do not always take into account all alternative forms of punishment before considering a custodial sentence, which should always be the court's last resort. If detention is appropriate, people in that age group—15, 16 and 17-year-olds—should be held in local authority secure accommodation, where they can receive appropriate help and support under a regime that provides strict boundaries while recognising that such people are teenagers, not adults.

The Youth Justice Board requires that all girls under the age of 18 be provided with a minimum of 15 hours of education a week. For some of the girls, that is the most intensive education that they will have received for some time. One 16-year-old girl to whom I spoke had not attended school since she was 11. Is it any wonder that she found life difficult?

Although accredited work and education must be provided to under-18s, it is not a requirement for young offenders. Therefore 18 to 21-year-olds can be required to undertake work that will do little to further their education and training opportunities. There is no requirement for the staff who look after them to have any specialist training in dealing with young people. Young offenders are an equally vulnerable group who are at a point in life at which the right support, education and training opportunities could ensure that following their discharge from prison they lead a valuable and law-abiding life.

Many of the girls are serving sentences of less than six months, and some just a few weeks. Such sentences are too short to make a real difference to their education and training opportunities, but are long enough to create an obstacle to their future employment. The very fact that they have been in custody may deter future employers, landlords and others from offering them assistance.

On 14 December 1999, the Minister then responsible for prisons, my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), now Chief Secretary to the Treasury, reiterated a commitment made by a previous Home Secretary that from > "April 2000, 15 and 16 year old girls will be placed in local authority care, not in prison. In the longer term sentenced young women aged 17 will also be placed outside Prison Service custody."

That commitment was reinforced by the Youth Justice Board's plan to make it a priority to place all young women outside adult prisons by mid-2002.

The latest Home Office figures for May this year suggest that that has not yet happened: eight female 15-year-olds, 29 16-year-olds and 81 17-year-olds were being held in prison. Indeed, since 1999, the number of girls aged under 18 in prison has risen, from 86 to 120 this year. The rise in custodial sentences should be contrasted with the fall in recorded crimes committed by 15 to 17-year-old girls. By continuing the practice of holding juveniles with adults in adult prisons, the Government breach the UN convention on the rights of the child. That cannot be right.

The evidence about the unsuitability of prison for girls and young women has been known for some time. In 1997, the Howard League for Penal Reform—for whose support I am grateful and of whose advisory council I am a member—published the results of a year-long inquiry into the use of prison custody for girls. I urge the Minister to read that report, digest the case studies and consider implementing the recommendations. Surely those vulnerable young people should be afforded the protection of the Children Act 1989. Why do we continue to operate a policy in contravention of the United Nations convention?

I started my speech by referring to the social exclusion unit, which is incredibly important. It shows how the Government think that we should tackle the real problems in our society. If we are to reduce crime, we have to consider the factors that create an environment in which people commit crime, and those are the very issues being addressed by the social exclusion unit. Poverty, homelessness, debt, mental illness, unemployment and drug and alcohol misuse are factors that can have an influence. Many of the young girls that I am talking about are vulnerable, misguided children, not evil calculating adults. They need help as well as punishment. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

9.45 am

Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Claire Ward) on securing this debate on a subject of great importance. I was made aware of the issue by a book by Angela Devlin called "Invisible Women: What's Wrong with Women's Prisons". It revealed the dreadful situation in our women's prisons. That book was published in 1998, and the issue was then raised in Parliament in several ways. I think that we are aware that there have been improvements since then.

The increasing prison population is inexplicable and extremely worrying. Only a few years ago, the prison population was 42,000, and it is now a record 71,000. That means that 132 people per 100,000 of the population are in prison. It puts the United Kingdom in the top two or three of the 43 countries of the Council of Europe. The only country with a worse record is the United States, where the figure is 700 people per 100,000. The average figure among the Council of Europe countries is about 50 per 100,000, but our prison population goes on increasing, expensively and to the detriment of the country, although few of us believe that prison works.

An extremely worrying feature of life in prison, which was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Watford, is the number of young women who react to their plight by mutilating themselves. That is a common reaction to abuse. Young women who go to prison are likely to have been abused by society, their partners or their families. The almost universal treatment for those who mutilated themselves used to be neuroleptic drugs, which are overused in residential homes for the elderly, and are meant for the deeply psychotic. Their use was so common in prisons that young women on those drugs were known by the cruel epithet of "muppets", because they walked strangely. I hope that that practice has ended, but it was difficult to break through the closed communities in which everyone supported everyone else. The prison doctor, the governors and so on tended to work together.

In Holland there have been many reforms that we could copy, one of which is that when women are sentenced to prison, they can, if they choose, have a period of about a fortnight before they start their sentence. Nothing could be worse than when a mother kisses goodbye to her children in the morning and does not appear when they come home from school. Many sentences are unexpected, and the chaos and disruption that results from that is completely unnecessary. Very few women prisoners are violent or dangerous in the way that many male prisoners are. That reform could—and, I believe, should—be introduced as an urgent priority.

A report by the chief inspector of prisons has been mentioned. Time and again, the previous chief inspector reported that there was no need for most of the women in prison to be there. Reports have given examples of women who had committed the most trivial offences and, because they had a long record of previous convictions, were imprisoned.

Most women are in prison for reasons such as debt, and our society encourages debt. Idiotic advertisements saturate daytime television, telling people that if they have debts, they should not worry because they can ring a certain advice firm, and solve all their problems. Those firms actually multiply debt and increase the period of indebtedness, but they lull people into a false sense of thinking that debts do not matter. Often, the debts are not magicked away, but people who have got into debt—often for loving reasons because they have been looking after their families—find themselves in prison. Our record on that is dreadful.

Communities in prison are often dominated by gangsterism. Prison society used to be run by tobacco barons, but it is now dominated by drugs. Many prisons have a dreadful atmosphere, and there are practices that I would not want to go into today. The punishments that we mete out, especially to women prisoners, are often cruel and barbaric because we separate mothers from their toddlers and babies. We have heard that women react to imprisonment more seriously than most men do and find it more damaging. We hear about women entering prison as shoplifters and leaving as drug addicts. Some women enter prison as cannabis users. People are complaining that we are about to announce today a change in the law that allows people to be sentenced to 14 years in jail for some cannabis crimes—murder carries an equivalent sentence. We have sent women to prison for using soft drugs, and they have come out addicted to hard drugs. We cannot provide a single prison—for women or men—that is free from illegal drug use. There are occasionally drug-free wings, but we put people into prisons in which it is often easier to obtain drugs than on the streets.

This debate is very important. The Minister has talked about the dreadful record on not only mutilation, but suicide attempts by women in prison and the way in which they suffer. We have a very poor record as a Parliament and a country on the increasing female prison population.

[Paul Flynn]

The ninth commandment of Back Benchers is that we should neglect the rich, the obsessed and the articulate, and seek out silent voices. Few voices are quieter than those of women in prison. The situation is an awful example of man's inhumanity to women.

9.52 am

Jean Corston (Bristol, East): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Claire Ward) on securing the debate. I am grateful for being able to participate.

Between 1995 and 1997, I was a member of the Select Committee on Home Affairs. During one of the Committee's inquiries, I visited many prisons in both this country and the United States. Owing to my interest in the subject, I have visited other prisons including, notably, Eastwood Park, with my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd). We were both very worried about the conditions of the women who were held there. We made that visit before 1997, and I attest to the truth of what my hon. Friends have said about the conditions of women in prison, the reasons why they are there and the catastrophic effects that prison has on them and their children.

I shall confine my remarks to two narrow subjects, but first I congratulate the Government on setting up the women's policy group in January 1998. The matters that it is considering show that several lessons have been learnt.

An occasion in the Chamber that I shall never forget was when the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) attempted to justify the shackling of pregnant women prisoners. It is fair to say that she got a pretty severe roasting from female Labour Members. She found the position hard to defend. I am pleased by the new arrangements for the treatment of pregnant women when they go into labour that have been introduced since we came to power. I understand that now all restraints should be removed when they are in hospital, and replaced only when they leave. I was amused to discover that prison officers can be present in the delivery room, or during an intimate examination, only if that is requested by the prisoner. I cannot imagine that such a request would be made, but at least it is no longer required that a prison officer should be present at all times.

Women who are pregnant and have their babies in prison face considerable difficulties. Throughout the country, there are only 64 places for them in mother and baby units, although I gather that 24 further places are planned—two 12-bed units. As a result, they have to travel great distances.

In Holloway and New Hall, women can keep their babies with them for up to nine months, whereas in Askham Grange and Styal they can keep their children with them until they are 18 months old. After that time, if the women have not completed their sentences, their babies are taken away from them—an 18-month-old child is still a baby. It is only when one talks to inmates in prisons such as Holloway that one realises what that means. Many of the women prisoners have had babies when they were very young. I will never forget talking to one young mother as I went around the unit at Holloway. I asked her how old her baby was. She replied, "Eight months." She looked haunted and traumatised. I asked her if she had other children, and she said that she did. That was when I realised that she would have to decide in four weeks' time whether to give up the baby at nine months so that she could stay in Holloway and be near her other children, or apply to go to either Askham Grange or Styal so that she could stay with the baby until eighteen months but risk losing contact with her other children who lived in the south-east. That is an intolerable position to put anyone in. If that does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, I do not know what does.

It is impossible for women who are in that position to discharge their responsibilities as parents in a meaningful way. I acknowledge that they are in prison because they have committed crimes but, as several of my hon. Friends have said, the types of crimes for which women are imprisoned are generally quite trivial. I met women in Holloway who had been imprisoned for not paying their bills; they were in prison because, eventually, debt becomes a criminal offence—although there are conventions that say that nobody should be imprisoned for debt.

Reference has also been made to self harm. I wish to recount an unpleasant incident that happened when I was at Eastwood Park, because I want people to understand what self harm can mean to the prisoners who harm themselves, their fellow prisoners and prison staff. Several years ago, there was a young woman who was severely psychotic at Eastwood Park. She had had an abdominal operation some time before. One night, she took off her bra and used its hook to open up the wound and disembowel herself. The other prisoners realised that this was happening, and the prison officer who went into her cell to see what the noise was about, was, as anyone could understand, utterly traumatised by what she saw. That woman should not have been in prison. She was severely mentally ill. She had been convicted of a crime and I can only presume that that had something to do with her illness.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Cook—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. I would be remiss in my responsibilities were I not to remind hon. Members that the House, in its wisdom, took the decision when establishing this parallel Chamber that the four senior members of the Chairmen's Panel be appointed Deputy Speakers of Westminster Hall. While occupying this Chair, they should be referred to in those terms.

Jean Corston: I am grateful for that advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In concluding my remarks, I quote from this year's prisons handbook an article headed, "Viewpoint: Women Prisoners". It is by Lisa Edwards, a serving prisoner at Cookham Wood, and says:

> "The penal system is geared to men, not women; this needs to be addressed. There are several courses on offer in the male prisons that are not available in the female prisons. This is not good enough. Female lifers have as much right to be rehabilitated as men do."

She continues:

> "We need more education, courses on drug and alcohol awareness, anger management, relationships, offending behaviour and victim awareness, as well as life and social skills."

At this point, I declare an interest as one of the trustees of an educational charity called Award Scheme Development Accreditation Network, known by its acronym, ASDAN. It provides education in life skills to thousands of students in schools and colleges all over the country. I have seen the effects of its work and can only say to my hon. Friend the Minister that that kind of education should be more widely available in prisons.

Lisa Edwards goes on to say:

> "We need help to help ourselves once released. Give us jobs in prison that will actually aid us outside, not mind numbing jobs like packing plastic spoons! Teach us new skills that we can use . . . Don't place us in prisons hundreds of miles away from family and friends. It is so important to maintain the bond with your children. Just because you are in prison, it doesn't mean you stop being a mother."

Of course, when those women leave prison, they could be sitting on the bus alongside any of us, or serving us at a supermarket checkout. They could be working in all kinds of jobs where we could come face to face with them. Surely it is in our interests, if those women are to be imprisoned, to make that an experience that allows them some opportunity for reform and life-chance, not just one that focuses on retribution.

10.3 am

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I have not had an opportunity to prepare for this debate. I am disappointed to come into this Chamber and discover that so few Members are interested in this very important subject. I want to emphasise the point that some hon. Friends have made about the large proportion of women prisoners who are in prison simply because they are poor and cannot afford to pay their debts.

I did a great deal of research on that pre-1997, and introduced a private Member's Bill that would have removed the option of sending fine defaulters to prison simply because they could not pay their debts. So many women are sent to prison not because they are wilfully refusing to pay debts but because they are unable to meet their commitments. That is termed culpable neglect by the courts, but much research has been done that shows that it happens simply because people are poor and unable to face up to their commitments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) graphically illustrated how people can get into debt when they are desperate and fall prey to loan sharks and other temptations that more robust and less poor individuals might be able to avoid. I am very disappointed that women in particular—but also men—are being sent to prison because they are poor and cannot afford to meet their fines. Of course, such individuals should receive some punishment, but I do not see why that could not take place in the community where they could repay society. It costs hundreds of pounds a week to send people to jail because they are poor. However, if we helped them to manage their finances better, and provided for some kind of punishment in the community so that people could contribute to society through work and other endeavours, we would be a more civilised society. We would also prevent further decline, such as lapses into mental illness and family breakdown, which occurs as a result of so many poor women with mental health difficulties being sent to prison.

Only last week another private Member's Bill was introduced to prevent people from being jailed for debt and fine default. When the Minister responds, I hope that he will dwell to some extent on that issue. I would like a commitment from the Government that they intend to bring in legislation to prevent fine defaulters from being sent to prison and introduce alternative community punishments. Even if it is not possible to introduce legislation in the near future, signals from Ministers and guidance to magistrates courts on the issue of culpable neglect would be very welcome. I invite the Minister to respond to that point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps it would be useful if I were to advise the House of an opinion registered collectively on the Chairmen's Panel. Let me start by reminding hon. Members that this debate is scheduled to go no longer than 11 o'clock. The common convention in the past has been that the three winding-up speeches start 30 minutes before that, with those 30 minutes split equally between the three concluding speakers. In this event, Members will see that there are 53 minutes remaining, and the Chairman's Panel has been anxious that that equality of apportionment be maintained because it has been known for some speakers to run over quite a bit, thereby creating a situation that is considered unfair. Might I make it clear that Front-Bench speakers, of whom there are three, will be admonished if they exceed a third of that time. They do not have to take all of it, but they are not to overrun, if I might put it in those terms. I am grateful for your attention.

10.8 am

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): I do not think that I will be taking a third of the time because I do not intend to speak for the sake of it.

First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Watford (Claire Ward). She has raised issues of extreme importance this morning, and the moving stories from the case studies to which she referred contributed greatly to the whole debate. We have had many other contributions that to me, as a new Member, have been stark and frightening, but underline what the debate is really about.

I started considering the issue by looking at the prison population as a whole. The latest figure that I have, which is perhaps not the actual latest figure, is 71,360 people in prison, sadly. I started to think about the different, overlapping subsets within that total. I was wondering how many would be left if one identified all prisoners with sentences less than 12 months, and all those with mental health difficulties. Perhaps the Minister knows better than I do. That highlights the wider issues of appropriate placements and sentences, of which much has been made in the debate.

[Mrs. Annette L. Brooke]

Before turning to female prisoners, it is important to consider the subset of children. The annual report of the Youth Justice Board was published yesterday. It is an interesting and excellent report in which Lord Warner, the chairman, states:

> "Despite these successes it has not so far been possible to reduce the use of custody as much as the Board would like."

He goes on to say that > "the use of longer sentences by the courts . . . can only make it more difficult to maintain improvements".

I believe that a press article in The Independent yesterday stemmed from the launch. Under the headline

"Youth Justice Board protests at rising children locked up",

Lord Warner was quoted as saying:

> "'You have the bizarre situation where you could be putting into custody for quite short periods of time school-age kids who are in desperate need of education, who are under-performing educationally, and you have made the whole problem of getting them back into education more difficult.'
> The youth crime chief called for courts to consider alternatives to custody."

Ministers and the Lord Chief Justice have dealt with the issue. Clearly, it will be an important matter during the next few weeks with a White Paper coming out, which, I hope, will cover sentencing.

In addition to the Youth Justice Board's report, this weekend a prominent children's charity described the Government's policy on youth crime as an abuse of children's human rights. An example was given of a child with learning disabilities who was remanded in custody for the theft of toffees from a jar of sweets and criminal damage to the lid of the jar. Among the children in custody are those who are in prison. A book about them entitled "Vulnerable Inside" will be published this week by the Children's Society. It includes an example of a 16-year-old telling of a child who committed suicide after bullying and how the others in prison reacted:

> "This morning when we came out for breakfast the screws said that he had tried to kill himself and he was in hospital on a life support machine. At dinner they said he was dead. Everyone was quiet."

That is horrendous. Children's charities are voicing serious concerns to the Home Secretary.

I am also concerned by the Home Secretary's April announcement that suspects as young as 12 will be remanded in custody for persistent petty crimes. I fear that younger children are taking up local authority accommodation places, and that that is pushing 15 and 16-year-olds back into prison. I would be grateful if the Minister would tell us how that all comes together, because it would be dreadful if we were actually making the situation worse. I wonder if this is why the £250 million initiative announced in March 2001, a four-year programme to ensure that no teenage girls and fewer 15 and 16-year-old boys are held in prison and that 80 per cent. of offenders are located within 50 miles of their home—all changes that are needed—does not seem to be on target.

As the hon. Member for Watford reminded us, the Government have been promising to remove girls from prison. Unfortunately, for various reasons, they continue to be placed there. I would like to refer to an Adjournment debate held on 29 January this year, which was initiated by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) and focused on a tragic case in his constituency of a girl who had gone from one institution to another and fallen through every gap it is possible to fall through. In reply, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, now the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration, stated:

> "At the moment, about 170 girls are in custody. The hon. Gentleman may know that there is a ministerial commitment to remove all 15 and 16-year-old girls from Prison Service custody by the summer."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 29 January 2002; Vol. 379, c. 63WH.]

We seem to be slipping behind the targets. Girls are not committing more crimes, so is sentencing the problem? Those issues hugely concern me.

Before I conclude, I should like to move on to a topic with which I have tussled for some time: whether we should be concerned about men as well. I have been convinced by this morning's contributions on that matter. I found a useful reference to the issue by Anne Dunne in "Safer Society" from summer 2001. She says:

> "In the majority of cases the best way to promote resettlement and prevent reoffending is not to send women to prison in the first place. This is not preferential treatment for women. It takes account of the principle that treating men and women equally does not mean treating them the same. Imprisonment has a different and more damaging impact on women. We need policies which recognise that women's offending is different and which responds appropriately and proportionately. Way back in 1991 NACRO suggested Community Houses."

More recently, the Prison Reform Trust issued a piece of work called "Justice for Women", which suggests:

> "A network of centres should be established to provide effective supervision and rehabilitation to offenders serving community sentences."

It is vital that we introduce such local centres.

We keep focusing on mental health issues, the nature of sentencing and the appropriateness of placements. When the inspectorate visited prisoners at Eastwood Park it commented:

> "It was impossible not to be struck by the profound personality disturbance and mental health problems that many presented."

In the Adjournment debate to which I referred earlier, the Minister commented on the shortage of places with adequate psychiatric treatment. I should like to refer to a recent report by the social exclusion unit, which does so much vital work, on reoffending that includes an annexe on juveniles. One of its many points is:

> "Too many young people remain in custody when they need in-patient mental health care and the vast majority of those with diagnosable mental health problems but who do not require mental health admission do not receive adequate management and care from custodial or community-based services."

We know what the problems are and need to address them. I recognise that the Government have gone a long way by setting up so many initiatives. It seems as though the problem is increasing and we are not keeping up with it. We have to reflect on whether that is due to crime or sentencing and take appropriate action. We cannot turn our backs on a problem with which we need to get to grips. There are positive outcomes and yesterday's report from the social exclusion unit was also positive. However, the report lists all the enormous issues relating to young offender teams that still have to be tackled. It is a huge task and the Government need to put resources into the area to match their commitment. They need to stand up and be proud to say that they have tackled the issue of the socially excluded and that we have a prison system that works.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Watford (Claire Ward) on obtaining the debate.

This is undoubtedly a serious subject and all the contributions have referred to serious issues. Some of the Government's responses are at odds with the views that have been expressed this morning by Labour Back Benchers. I shall quote what one Government spokesman said in a major report:

> "I also reject any call for preferential treatment for women offenders. The current system does impact differently on women and men, because women are usually the primary carers for their children, and because their small numbers in the system can mean prison places further from home. However, there is also evidence that women are in some respects treated more leniently than men by sentencers. Research suggests that women are less likely than men to get sent to prison, even within the same offence groups and when offenders have similar criminal records, and women tend to get shorter sentences on average."

Those were the words of the former Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), as he came to the end of his term in that office.

Not everyone in the Government necessarily speaks with a single voice, and many of those who spoke in today's debate, including the hon. Member for Watford, were critical of the current position. I agree with those hon. Members. When the right hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) said that the record in this field was dreadful—I carefully wrote down what he said—I agreed with him. The hon. Member for Watford stressed that the Government, through the former Home Office Minister, the right hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), made various promises about changes in prison accommodation for young women that have not been kept.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) stressed in a debate in December 2001 that there were many problems at Downview—a prison in his constituency. Other hon. Members have been critical of what has been happening at Holloway, and there have been further criticisms of other prisons for women, such as Bullwood Hall.

I am the first to accept that the area is difficult. Some women have committed extremely serious offences. Many hon. Members who have spoken this morning said in parenthesis that they accept that some women must be given custodial sentences. I would have been happier however had they said more about the victims of crimes. Too often in this place, concern is shown for the offender and not the victim. I have spent much of my career, both during my 10 years in this House and previously, working with organisations such as Victim Support. In any debate on prisons and custody one should always mention the fact that some of those who have committed offences have had the opportunity to continue their lives, whereas the victims have not been given that chance.

Claire Ward: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hawkins: In a moment.

It has been stressed by several speakers, including the hon. Member for Watford, that some people are in prison simply because of debt. The hon. Member for Newport, West rather overstated the case when he said that most women in prison are there because of debt. The figures from the House of Commons Library do not support that contention—I am sorry that the hon. Member for Newport, West did not stay in the Chamber to hear the responses from the Front Benches, but I have no doubt that what I say will be reported to him. If one examines the offences that have led to women being in prison, only a minority are there for non-payment of fines or for debt.

Claire Ward: I should stress that I said during my speech that I did not condone any of the actions of those who are held in prison, whether they are young offenders, juveniles or women prisoners. There are occasions on which detention is appropriate. However, there has not been a discussion about the victims of crime because this debate is about prisoners. In future, I might apply for a debate on the victims of crime, but we are discussing prisoners, and issues such as whether the conditions in which they are held are appropriate. It is a shame that the hon. Gentleman has made a point about victims on this occasion.

Mr. Hawkins: I accept that the hon. Lady mentioned that she does not condone in any way the crimes that have been committed. I was simply making the observation that we have heard a lot of speeches on the main subject of the debate, and until I spoke nobody had mentioned the victims of crime. When we debate prisoners, there should also be some mention of victims.

Another significant matter that should be referred to when we talk about women in custody is the recent huge controversy about the short custodial sentence that was imposed on a lady whose children had persistently failed to attend school. There were howls of protest when that sentence was announced, particularly in the liberal press, but those howls were immediately silenced when, having served a very short custodial sentence—it had been reduced on appeal—the lady said that it was the best thing that could have happened to her because it was the only thing that could have forced her to concentrate her mind on how important it is that children should go to school. I think that it was the hon. Member for Newport, West who said that very few people think that prison works, but this prisoner felt that it had worked for her. Her sentence also sent a valuable signal to other feckless and irresponsible parents who were not ensuring that their children get the benefits of education. I have no doubt that persistent truancy—which is quite often aided and abetted by parents—will fall significantly as a result of that deterrent sentence.

However, the custody of women and girls raises extremely important issues that must be addressed. The Government have promised to tackle the shortcomings in the system, but so far—after more than five years in power—they have failed to do so. I hope that the Minister will tell us today that some of those shortcomings have a greater prospect of being addressed in the immediate future.

There are continuing concerns about the rise in the female prison population. I was surprised that many hon. Members said that it would be better if young women prisoners were in local authority secure accommodation. I have considerable experience of the criminal justice system from my career at the Bar and the 10 years or so that I have spent in this place, and local authority accommodation has a dreadful record. It would not be advantageous if more young women were to be in the care—which is the official description, but it is very often inappropriate—of local authorities. What we need are humane prisons. People who have committed serious offences and have to receive a custodial sentence are sent to prison as a punishment, rather than for punishment; that has always been the mantra of the Prison Service.

We hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us that further progress is being made. I accept several of the points that have been made about the tragic events that happen to some young women and girls who are in custody, and I recognise that more must be done to address them. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Hilary Benn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Claire Ward) on securing this debate. It addresses an important issue. I also congratulate my hon. Friend on the clarity with which she put her argument, and the passion with which she related and reflected upon the experiences of girls and young women in custody. In so doing, she has done the House a great service.

Running as a thread through all the contributions is the extent to which the young people whom we are discussing have suffered a lifetime of lack of care in its broadest sense. That strikes me most forcefully. There is really no other way to describe it. The social exclusion unit report published last week makes the point all too clearly for juveniles—boys as well as girls. Nearly 90 per cent. miss significant periods of education in their lives. My hon. Friend the Member for Watford mentioned meeting one young woman who had hardly been in school since the age of 11. Nearly two-thirds have previously been looked after by local authorities, so have not had the benefit of the love, care and support that families are able to provide. Nearly half have literacy and numeracy levels below those of the average 11-year-old. HM chief inspector of prisons undertook a survey that found that two out of five girls reported having experienced violence at home and one in three said that they had experienced sexual abuse.

I am sure that all hon. Members would acknowledge that the young people we are talking about are damaged human beings who cause damage to others as well as to themselves. We should acknowledge the damage done to others, and I recognise the point made by my hon. Friend about the nature of this debate. However, one reason why we are discussing the consequences of the rise in the number of young people sentenced to custody is the general debate that is taking place and is reflected in my own surgeries, as it is in those of other hon. Members.

People are concerned about the impact of crime on their lives. They feel frustrated, frightened, angry and bewildered about the damage caused by the consequences of crime. As a society, we are trying to work out how to deal with that. The debate about custody and its effective alternatives is at the heart of the debate about how to tackle the problem, not least because of the size of the prison population.

The challenge is how to prevent further damage being done to others by the significant proportion who go on to reoffend, while trying to address the legacy of the social exclusion that many of the young offenders experience in their short lives For that reason one of the first priorities of the Government since being elected in 1997 has been to reform the youth justice system: by establishing the Youth Justice Board for England and Wales, introducing the youth offending teams, and providing courts with the powers to intervene earlier and more effectively when young people get into trouble.

I am pleased to tell the Chamber that that there have been two real successes as a result of the work that the Government have done. The first has been to meet our pledge to halve the time between commission of the offence and young people appearing before the courts for sentence in some shape or form. That is the product of much hard work done by people within the criminal justice system.

Secondly, the first indications of reconviction figures since the implementation of those reforms, show a 14.6 per cent. reduction in reconviction rates compared with juveniles dealt with in 1997, which was the reference period. That has been achieved in one year with the first cohort. We shall have to see whether that progress is maintained, but it is set against the Government's target of a 5 per cent. reduction in four years. That is progress.

The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) criticised the Government for what he felt they had failed to do—as he would, because it is his job. Being a fair man, I am sure that he would acknowledge those two real examples of progress that have occurred as a result of the reforms introduced by the Government.

I agree with all hon. Members who said that juveniles should be sent to custody only as a last resort. That is precisely why we have provided the courts with a wide range of community-based penalties and introduced a range of new disposals that are specifically targeted at young people who might otherwise face custodial remand or sentence. Those new court orders have been augmented by the intensive supervision and surveillance programme, which targets the most persistent juvenile offenders and provides intensive monitoring for up to 24 hours a day, seven days a week, together with a highly structured programme of education, training and reparation to victims. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Watford acknowledged, there are some girls—and boys—whose offending is so serious or persistent that a custodial sentence is the only appropriate response. Lord Warner acknowledged that yesterday when talking about the publication of the Youth Justice Board annual report.

It is, of course, for the courts to make those judgments, but my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Lord Chancellor—and, indeed, the Lord Chief Justice—have recently made it clear that they have asked courts to consider carefully the decisions that they take about the sentences they impose, and to reserve custody for violent, sexual or persistent offenders.

There has been much debate this morning about why the figures for young women and girls in custody have been increasing. If we look at the statistics, we can see that it is due to a combination of factors. The first is that more girls and young women are appearing before the courts. Secondly, more of those who appear before courts are sentenced into custody, although they are still a tiny minority—some 96 per cent. of juveniles who appear before the court are not made subject to a custodial sentence. However, it is undoubtedly the case that girls who are sentenced to custody are receiving longer sentences than those given in, say, 1985. I was looking at those figures this morning.

My hon. Friends the Members for Newport, West (Paul Flynn), for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones), and for Bristol, East (Jean Corston), raised the issue of the imprisonment of women and girls for debt offences. At the invitation of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), I looked at the figures on that subject about three weeks ago. It is worth looking at those statistics, and I shall write to my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friends about them. The number of those sentenced to prison for non-payment of council tax or television licences has declined sharply in recent years, and I welcome that greatly.

It is not the case that hundreds of people—and certainly not women—are being sent to prison every week for fine defaulting. In 2000, an average of three women per week were sent to prison for that offence; that is roughly 150 people in that year. The average stay in custody for those women was only five days. I acknowledge the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak made about the difference between those who genuinely cannot pay and those who will not pay.

If we were to say that under no circumstances would non-payment of a fine result in a custodial sentence, it would create difficulties as regards those who persistently refuse to pay although they can, and there are such people. I refer to my earlier point about the concern in the wider community about the effectiveness of the penalties available under the criminal justice system. There is concern when people see that those who have been given a fine as an alternative to custody can pay but seek not to do so. That goes to the heart of the credibility of the system.

Paul Flynn: I should like to return to the subject of numbers. The Minister's explanation was not convincing and did not make sense. We know that the increase in women prisoners is three times the increase in male prisoners. The female prisoner population has doubled since 1996. Also, one in four women prisoners are placed on remand, although when they go to court, 65 per cent. of them do not receive custodial sentences. Those comments have been made by chief inspectors of prisons over the years. The courts seem to have the inclination to put more women than men on remand. Why on earth is that?

Hilary Benn: I would need to check the figures to find out whether the courts put more women than men on remand, but my hon. Friend is undoubtedly correct to say that the rise of the female prison population and the increasing sentence length are features of what has occurred over the past 15 years. I was making a specific point about fine defaulting and imprisonment of people who do not pay other debts. Numbers of people in those categories have declined sharply, and I have promised to write with those figures.

Lynne Jones: I acknowledged the Minister's point in my speech. Courts distinguish between wilful refusal and culpable neglect. I am asking him to give a commitment that the Government will introduce legislation so that it is not possible to send people—especially women—to jail because they are poor and cannot manage their debts. Such action cannot be right, however many people are involved. When I last examined the matter, about a third of women who were sent to prison were sent because they had not paid fines.

Hilary Benn: I cannot give my hon. Friend that undertaking, but if she examines the figures now, she will find that the proportion has reduced significantly. I shall write to her because she raised an extremely important point.

Girls and young women have particular needs that require special attention, and I turn to the placement of young women and girls in custody. We have made it clear that we ideally wish to hold girls in units that are close to their homes, and sufficiently large to provide the high-quality regimes about which hon. Members spoke and to keep them separate from over-18s. Owing to the small number of Prison Service establishments that are able to cater for girls, the Youth Justice Board tries, whenever possible, to place girls aged under 17 in non-Prison Service accommodation: local authority secure children's homes or secure training centres.

The Youth Justice Board embarked last year on a four-year plan to provide several hundred new places by extending existing centres and providing brand new centres in places where there is a lack of provision. As the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) reminded us, a key part of that plan is to improve provision for girls and vulnerable 15 and 16-year-old boys, with a view to removing all sentenced 15 and 16-year-old girls from Prison Service accommodation.

However, hon. Members will be aware that the juvenile secure estate has been under much pressure recently because of the trends that we have discussed, and the increase of juveniles in custody has affected the board's ability to meet its specific targets. However, achieving the objective to which my predecessors committed themselves remains our clear aim. Indeed, the number of non-Prison Service places available for girls has increased from 36 in April 2000 to 113 today. An additional 32 secure training places will come on stream later this year at the Medway secure training centre. During the past three months, the number of girls held in Prison Service places has started to decline. In April, 128 girls were held, and in May, 118 girls were held. Last month, 109 girls were held. That is an encouraging movement in the right direction.

People in the Prison Service sometimes voice concern about under-18s mixing with adults, which occurs for reasons to which I have referred. For example, there might be too few under-18s to accommodate them in juvenile-only accommodation while keeping them close to home and providing appropriate educational and recreational services. We are trying to balance the three objectives of meeting educational need, providing appropriate placements and keeping young offenders as close to home as possible. The three objectives must be juggled together.

The Youth Justice Board tries to avoid mixing as much as possible, and it supports the development of under-18 wings in larger women-only establishments, such as New Hall and Bullwood Hall, which my hon. Friend the Member for Watford visited recently.

My hon. Friend expressed worry about what happens to girls and young women who are in custody, and we are trying to address that in two ways. We have created the new detention and training order, which is a sentence that combines a period of custody with a period spent in the community under supervision. The order's aim is to focus on planned and constructive use of time in custody and on effectively supervision and support after release. We have improved regimes, and the Youth Justice Board is now responsible for commissioning and purchasing all forms of juvenile secure accommodation throughout England and Wales. Prison Service order 4950 sets out regimes for prisoners under 18 years old and applies equally to men and women. Three-year development plans are now in place at two women's prisons, Bullwood Hall and New Hall. The Youth Justice Board intends that they will be the only Prison Service establishments for girls by November this year, providing that the demand for juvenile places stabilises.

It has been acknowledged that this morning's debate about women and girls in prison goes to the heart of the debate that society must have about the balance between custody and effective alternatives. The lesson to be drawn from the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Watford is that we are dealing with the problem late in the day, when young offenders present themselves to the criminal justice system. If one thing has come across more clearly than any other this morning, it is that we must do even more to support families and to intervene at an earlier stage. Our work with sure start and the provision of extra support for families on low incomes will make a bigger contribution to minimising the damage that the young people have experienced, which leads them to cause damage to others. That, in the long term, is the greatest investment that we can make.

People can only give out to society what they themselves have been given. If they have never been given love, encouragement and support, it is difficult for them to show those qualities to others. If a person's only experience of human relations is being banged on the head, it is not surprising that that person responds to other human beings in a similar way. In our society today, it is difficult to achieve the proper result for all our young people. We must really work harder to ensure that we provide that sort of upbringing, because it is the best crime reduction measure in the long term.

Northern Ireland Peace Process

11 am

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon): I am pleased to have secured the debate, as this is a particularly relevant time to discuss the future of the Northern Ireland peace process.

Last week, the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach chaired discussions with pro-agreement parties at Hillsborough. On Sunday, the world witnessed once again the dark side of Northern Ireland with the now almost ritual violence at Drumcree, and there have also been heightened tensions and serious sectarian clashes in parts of east and north Belfast.

Virtually everyone in Northern Ireland agrees that, as we approach the crucial Assembly elections in May next year, there is an urgent need to end the current drift and restore some momentum to the process. Otherwise all the hope and optimism that surrounded the signing of the Belfast agreement in April 1998 risk evaporating.

Like most other hon. Members, I warmly welcomed the agreement. After so many years of appalling terrorism and stalled political progress, it finally seemed as though Northern Ireland really was putting the past behind it. At long last, it seemed as though the organisations, both loyalist and republican, that were responsible for inflicting so much misery and suffering were intent on making the transition from violence to what the agreement describes as "exclusively democratic and peaceful means".

Many aspects of the agreement are working well. The Executive and the Assembly are demonstrating the benefits of having locally elected politicians who are accountable to the Northern Ireland electorate and responsible for the key decisions that affect people's everyday lives. Even those who oppose the agreement do not want devolution to end. Indeed, the two Democratic Unionist party Ministers are regularly cited as two of the most effective members of the Executive.

The north-south bodies are showing that practical, common-sense co-operation between Northern Ireland and the Republic does not, despite the fears of some, necessarily represent a slippery slope towards a united Ireland. We now have an agreed constitutional framework. Articles 2 and 3 of the Irish Republic's constitution have been amended, and Northern Ireland's position in the United Kingdom is guaranteed for as long as that is the wish of the people who live there.

Those developments might reassure the broader community in Northern Ireland were it not for the fact that, unfortunately, that represents only part of the overall picture. One area in which the agreement is clearly not working or living up to expectations is the ending of the cycle of paramilitary violence.

For many people, in particular the Unionist community, it was the prospect of an end to paramilitarism that convinced them to back the agreement. That persuaded them to set aside their revulsion at the sight of prisoners walking free from jail early; to take Sinn Fein on trust and tolerate its inclusion in the Government of Northern Ireland despite the fact that the decommissioning of illegal weapons had not even begun; and, reluctantly, to accept painful changes to the police. Yet the end to violence and paramilitarism has not happened. That fact is the biggest single factor undermining confidence in the agreement, and it threatens to destabilise the peace process.

Under the agreement, decommissioning was supposed to have been completed by May 2000. Instead, we had to wait until last October for the first batch of arms to be put beyond use, and that happened in response to the events of 11 September and pressure exerted by the resignation as First Minister of the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble).

In April, there was a second act of decommissioning, and this time it was clearly designed to increase Sinn Fein's prospects in the Irish general election. Without questioning the integrity of General de Chastelain, neither act of decommissioning was carried out in such a way as to maximise public confidence, which was the promise made by the IRA in its statement of 6 May 2000. Any remote hope that those two acts represent a genuine conversion to exclusively democratic politics has been completely devalued by subsequent events that have seriously called into question the credibility of the ceasefire on both sides.

We have had continuing revelations of IRA activity in Columbia, and its involvement with the narco-terrorists FARC—the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Columbia—including, if recent reports are to be believed, the testing of new weapons. It has also been reported recently in Washington that techniques passed by the IRA to FARC may have been responsible for 117 deaths in a bombing that took place as recently as 9 May.

The break-in at Castlereagh police station is widely believed, by the police and others, to be the work of the IRA. Documents discovered during an arrest in connection with Castlereagh showed that the IRA are continuing to target politicians and military bases on the mainland. Only last week we learned that several leading Northern Ireland and Westminster politicians and others have been warned by the police of a serious threat to their lives.

There is continuing street violence in areas such as the Short Strand and Cluan place, which is being orchestrated by paramilitaries, loyalist and republican alike. Many hon. Members no doubt met the Short Strand residents last week, who came over to put their catalogue of despair. So-called punishment beatings, shootings and mutilations continue almost daily. There are other manifestations of paramilitarism, such as the smuggling, racketeering and organised crime that was highlighted by the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs in its report published last week.

So extensive is the criminal network that we now have evidence that it has outgrown the Irish market. The paramilitaries are seeking to set up legitimate businesses on the mainland as fronts for their activities. Of particular concern to me as a west country Member of Parliament is the fact that their tentacles may be spreading to the west country. I have heard reports suggesting that such criminals are targeting the west country and trying to launder their money through legitimate pubs and tourism-related businesses.

I welcome the Government's attempts to address that very worrying development through the formation of the organised crime taskforce for Northern Ireland and the proposal for an assets recovery agency, but I ask the Minister to respond to the concerns of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee that that agency is substantially under-resourced if it is to tackle the problem seriously. Will the Minister make a commitment to provide it with the resources it needs from day one?

Quite apart from the misery that organised crime is causing many people in Northern Ireland, there is also the cost factor. Dr. Silke has calculated that for every £1 raised by paramilitaries in Northern Ireland in 1993 and spent in the pursuit of terrorism, the average cost to the Governments of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland in countering and repairing terrorist damage was £130. Based on those figures, Dr. Silke estimated that the overall cost of Northern Ireland terrorism to the Government in 1993 was in the region of £2 billion. No doubt the figure is now substantially higher.

Faced with all the evidence of ongoing activity, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that, when the Government say that in their view the ceasefire remains intact, they are using the paramilitary definition rather than that set out so clearly by the Prime Minister during the 1998 referendum campaign. It seems that, for the Government, the meaning of a ceasefire is a period in which soldiers and police officers are no longer killed, but virtually anything else goes. The Prime Minister casually refers to the transgressions of the ceasefire as imperfections, but he cannot argue that they are consistent with maintaining a complete and unequivocal ceasefire.

The clear and urgent task of the British and Irish Governments now is to take action to restore confidence. The university of Ulster published a report on 9 July based on the annual Life and Times survey. It found that Protestants had less confidence in the peace process than six years ago, and that fewer people thought that relations between Protestants and Catholics were better.

Restoring confidence was supposed to be the purpose of the meeting with the pro-agreement parties at Hillsborough last week. Regrettably, little progress seems to have been made, and little progress will be made until those parties in breach of their obligations under the agreement finally face up to their responsibilities.

Surely the time has come to introduce into the process some sanctions against parties that are failing to fulfil their obligations under the agreement. That is true of all parties, but particularly of Sinn Fein, because it has Ministers serving in the Northern Ireland Executive. As my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), the shadow Secretary of State, has made clear in the past, that does not necessarily require the pressing of the nuclear button that could bring the whole Assembly crashing down. Rather, it could be done on an escalating basis, beginning with the ending of Sinn Fein's special status in this House, not proceeding with the proposed amnesty for the so-called "on the runs" and not allowing those with terrorist convictions to sit on district policing partnerships.

If none of those measures works, the Government must seriously reconsider, as the Prime Minister promised in his famous side letter to the right hon. Member for Upper Bann on the morning of the Belfast agreement, the exclusion mechanisms in the agreement and the Northern Ireland Act 1998. They must be prepared to take on the power to exclude, rather than leaving it to a cross-community vote in the Assembly.

One thing is certain: it cannot be right for Ministers belonging to a party that is, in the Government's own words, inextricably linked with an active terrorist organisation to sit on the Executive indefinitely. Last Wednesday in the House, the Prime Minister repeated his assertion that there can be no halfway house between democracy and violence. He now needs to show that that is no longer simply empty rhetoric, and that he is prepared to act on his words.

Like other right hon. and hon. Members, I want this process to succeed. I believe that it retains the potential to bring lasting peace and stability to Northern Ireland, yet we cannot go on giving concession after concession, in what already appears to many people in Northern Ireland to be a one-way street. A peace process, or any other process, suggests ongoing progress. I contend that it is currently difficult to see what progress is being made along the lines envisaged in the Belfast agreement.

All those who desire the cessation of violence and long-term peace in Northern Ireland have invested much in the peace process and, necessarily, taken a lot on trust. Unionists have taken a number of risks, not least in being prepared to sit in government with Sinn Fein before the completion of decommissioning. Some might argue that they have been stretched to the limit in order to keep the process alive. However, unless something is done as a matter of urgency to restore credibility to the process, it potentially faces its biggest crisis and most difficult test so far. There is a narrow window of opportunity through which the current underlying lack of confidence can be tackled. I urge the Government not to squander it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. I ask right hon. and hon. Members to remain standing so that I can gauge how many want to speak in the time left. I can inform those who have not participated in debates in this Chamber before that it is customary to commence the three winding-up speeches 30 minutes before the end of the debate. Comments from the Floor must therefore have finished before 12 o'clock. I ask hon. Members to bear that in mind when making contributions and when making or receiving interventions, which should be crisp, clear and to the point.

11.14 am

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): I listened with interest to the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire). I should like him to cast his mind back to five years ago today when 20,000 Orangemen assembled at Drumcree. A nationalist from Belfast sent a relief convoy to the Garvaghy road and five Catholic families received bullets marked Ballymoney through the post. Sky TV broadcast scenes of hand-to-hand fighting across the barricades. In the middle of the night of 11 July 1998, three Catholic children—Richard, Mark and Jason Quinn—died in their bedroom. Victims of loyalist firebombs, their young lives were snuffed out.

By the following weekend, Drumcree IV had resulted in 2,561 public order incidents: 144 homes and 165 other buildings attacked; 178 hijackings; 467 vehicles damaged; 615 attacks on security forces; 24 stonings; 45 blast bombs; 284 arrests; 632 petrol bombs and 837 plastic bullets. Last weekend, there were nasty scenes at Drumcree, but one cannot compare that with five years ago and say that no progress has been made—this time there were three plastic bullets. Progress has been made, and it has been made on security.

We all deplore knee-cappings, punishment beatings and what is going on in the Short Strand and north Belfast, but progress has been made. The hon. Member for East Devon repeatedly referred to the role of the IRA. The IRA is doing more to undermine the peace process than to support it. It allows the hard men to say that they are not doing anything in an organised manner, and thus claims that it has honoured its ceasefire. However, every time we make progress it is belittled.

Like everyone else present, I have no desire to see private armies. I want them all to decommission their arms. I believe that there should be only one security force, but it must have and retain the support of the whole community. However, we will betray the people of Northern Ireland if we continually harp on about decommissioning and its associated problems.

We should consider what has been achieved by the parties and the Executive in Northern Ireland. An Assembly elected by fair proportional representation has created its own institutions and procedures, and it has adopted the symbol of the flax flower to reflect inclusive ideals across both communities. The Assembly Members have debated the most contentious issues of the day with passion and feeling. They have drawn up and begun to implement a programme of government for Northern Ireland, and have targeted social need wherever it is identified. New bodies for co-operation between the peoples of Ireland have been created. All-Ireland institutions have already demonstrated their practical value for the people of Ireland. Long overdue reforms in health, education and social services have begun. Progress has been made towards the abolition of the 11-plus and selective education—Northern Ireland is many years behind us in that, but is doing well. A Children's Rights Commission has also been established.

The Northern Ireland Executive have already started to address the chronic under-resourcing of the infrastructure, and are focusing on stable economic progress. Their programme of government is based on a vision of partnership, equality and mutual respect. Northern Ireland is building on its dynamic business community, its resourceful voluntary sector, co-operation in its industry and its vibrant and creative cultural heritage. On policing and criminal justice, a start has been made towards creating a representative and accountable criminal justice system in which all sides of the divided community can share a sense of ownership. On the values of a divided society, we have created new institutions for the protection and promotion of equality and human rights. Every public body has a positive duty to promote equality and fair treatment.

Those are great marks of progress, but there are still obstacles to overcome. Let us consider what is happening while those obstacles are being overcome. The vast majority of former political prisoners are helping to rebuild their communities. The Parades Commission is regulating provocative marches, surveillance towers and army checkpoints are being dismantled and the decommissioning of terrorist weapons has begun. Decommissioning has been slow, and there has not been enough of it. We all want decommissioning, because there is no place for private armies. Those who have visited Northern Ireland in the past year will have noticed that one has to look hard to find a policeman or Land Rover on the streets of Derry and Belfast. [Interruption.] The reason for that is that people have confidence. The streets are crowded with shoppers in the villages, towns and cities, and it is a great sight.

Lady Hermon (North Down): Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the low number of police officers available for duty in Northern Ireland? He will be familiar with the recommendation in the Patten report that the number of regular police officers should drop to 7,500 over 10 years. In the two and a half years since the Patten report, the number of police officers has dropped to 6,900. Will he comment on that?

Mr. McNamara: Yes, and the comment that I would make is that some members of the old Royal Ulster Constabulary did not like the new set-up and took advantage of the generous redundancy terms. I should like more people from both communities in the police force, as recommended by the Patten committee. Everyone wants a full police force in their society. There are still problems with implementing the reforms in the Patten report and taking proper control over special branch. Indeed, the oversight commissioner has indicated to the Government that extra progress must be made quickly.

Enormous problems exist on the streets, and nobody should deny that. The fear and insecurity felt by parts of both communities in Belfast has to be recognised. Some leadership is being given, but leadership is not provided when people constantly threaten to resign. Leadership is not given when people say that concessions are only being made to the IRA and the SDLP. The original Police (Northern Ireland) Bill and the Patten report were gutted. We were unable to debate on the Floor of the House the changes to the Criminal Justice and Police Bill, which was also gutted. Concessions have gone both ways.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNamara: I shall finish my sentence and then I shall be delighted to give way. I want security measures that both communities support. The SDLP, with tremendous courage, joined the Police Authority. It had the right to expect that the reforms that were promised in the Patten report and elsewhere would be carried through to the letter, and there is disappointment that that has not yet been achieved.

Lady Hermon: I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman halfway through his sentence, and I appreciate his giving way to me a second time. Will he clarify what he means when he says that the Patten report was gutted? He will recall that last autumn the American, Irish and British Governments and the Catholic Church with one voice said that the implementation plan and the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 represented the spirit and letter of Patten. How can he say that it has been gutted?

Mr. McNamara: I understand what the hon. Lady is saying. The Weston Park agreement—

Hon. Members: It was not an agreement.

Mr. McNamara: The Weston Park meeting—as hon. Gentlemen said, it was not an agreement. At a conference at Weston Park, undertakings were given that what had been left out of the Police (Northern Ireland) Bill would be inserted and that the necessary legislation would be introduced. I want the Government to tell us when that will happen.

It is wrong to keep picking up the agreement as though it were a flower in a garden and looking at its roots to see how it is developing. It has developed strongly and well due to the courage of people in this Room who have represented opposing traditions for years but who met together for the good of Northern Ireland. The agreement is the possession of the parties in Northern Ireland but, more particularly, of the people of Ireland, north and south. We must make it our duty to ensure that, whatever the shortcomings, we work towards constructive, purposeful elections to the Assembly next year and that we defend the peace process and not just the position of individuals, no matter how eminent they may be.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing a debate on this important topic. I never thought that the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) would portray himself as a latter-day Dr. Pangloss, but that is what he has done in the past few moments.

There has been considerable political progress in Northern Ireland, and Members of the Assembly and I are happy to take credit for it. However, the difficulty that we are in at the moment is entirely because the paramilitary organisations—I use the term collectively—have not made the progress that we wished. In the past few months there have been very serious problems at street level, mainly in Belfast, which have largely been caused by paramilitary organisations. Loyalist paramilitaries have been partly responsible, but the greater share of the responsibility lies with the republican movement, in particular the IRA.

The hon. Member for Hull, North may not take my word for that. I refer him to the words of the Assistant Chief Constable responsible for Belfast, Mr. McQuillan, who said in an interview after a particularly vicious outbreak of rioting in east Belfast:

> "And certainly, in terms of street disorder, on the republican side, we have seen large numbers of republicans, large numbers of members of the IRA, many of them from outside the area, and we believe that they're involved in organising the violence."

[Mr. David Trimble]

Mr. McQuillan was then asked about the shooting of five Protestants during the rioting. He was not prepared to rule definitively on who was responsible, but went on to say that

> "people who know the Short Strand well will know that the IRA have huge influence in that area, they are the main republican paramilitary group in that area, and we see very clear evidence of orchestration of the riots in that area."

Hon. Members might like to reflect on what would have happened if any of the five persons who were shot by republicans on that occasion had died and where the peace process would have been in that situation. The process was that close to collapsing. For that reason, we must reflect again on these matters.

The hon. Member for East Devon referred to the definition of a ceasefire that the Prime Minister gave in May 1998. I shall not read it out, because hon. Members should be familiar with it. It is very different from the definition given recently by Martin McGuinness, who said that a ceasefire is when they are not shooting soldiers or policemen and everything else to be permissible. Unfortunately, it seems that the Northern Ireland Office operates largely by reference to Mr. McGuinness's definition rather than that of the Prime Minister. The matter should be carefully reconsidered.

One good thing that came from the Prime Minister's visit last week was that he made it clear in his press conference that the transition that should be occurring needs to continue. He said:

> "Transition means transition, full transition from violence to democracy. Now, we've got to look therefore at the ways that we make that clear, that we lay down the clear principles that we have to abide by, and what happens if people don't abide by them."

He also said that he would make proposals and declare the position that he set out before Parliament rises. We are expecting that, between now and the rise of Parliament, the Prime Minister will return to the matter and spell out more precisely what a ceasefire means, how that transition should progress and what happens if the paramilitaries breach those lines. It may take the form of a redefinition of "ceasefire", and I hope that it will be closer, if not identical, to the definition given by the Prime Minister in May 1998.

However, we need more than just that. We need a procedure by which the definition has credibility and there is popular confidence in it. Regrettably, there would be no confidence in the definition if the determination of whether the ceasefire had been broken was left to a Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. I do not think that there would be credibility in Northern Ireland, because of what has happened in the past.

David Burnside (South Antrim): My right hon. Friend will remember a policy submission that the Ulster Unionist party made to No. 10 to try to help the Prime Minister to define decommissioning. It suggested setting up a Privy Council Committee with representation from the Government, the Opposition, the General Officer Commanding Northern Ireland and the Chief Constable to define whether the Provisional IRA was adhering to the Mitchell principles. Would he consider resubmitting that to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Trimble: My hon. Friend is close to my next point. I said that there would not be popular confidence in a judgment by a Secretary of State—I am speaking generally—because there has been lack of confidence in the successive occupants of that post. We need some objectivity. My hon. Friend referred to proposals for a rather elaborate procedure, and I note with regret that although we thought at that time that the Chief Constable and GOC should be part if it, I am not sure that in the present circumstances a procedure resting partly or wholly on the Chief Constable would command confidence or be effective. It is clear that the Irish Government have no confidence in the comments made by the Chief Constable of Northern Ireland and they showed that clearly concerning the Castlereagh raid. The former Chief Constable and the current acting Chief Constable have both said clearly and repeatedly that the police believe that the Castlereagh raid was the work of republicans, but the Irish Government still have their head in the sand and, like some hon. Members, refuse to accept that judgment. We must look further than that.

The precise objective mechanism is a matter for further consideration, but there is clearly a need for something that will give credibility to the ceasefire and the judgments that are made on it. There is also a clear need for a sanction, and that was foreshadowed in what the Prime Minister said about what happens if people do not abide by the ceasefire. The sanction must be credible. If there is no credible sanction, the present instability, which was caused by the paramilitaries, will continue.

I am concerned about the approach to some matters, particularly by the Prime Minister. During the press conference he commended the republican leadership and expressed confidence in its commitment to making the peace process work. I want the Prime Minister to reflect on that. I do not think that the republican leadership intends to return to a full-scale terrorist campaign at present, but it is clearly committed to a strategy of tension, not to exclusively peaceful means. That strategy is demonstrated in the orchestration of riots. The primary target for those riots is the SDLP, the party led by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume). The republican leadership is trying to discredit policing and, through that, to discredit the SDLP's valuable support for policing arrangements in Northern Ireland.

Republicans are following the strategy of tension so that others carry the strains of the process, not themselves. They are moving as slowly and as grudgingly as they can, and are leaving it to the SDLP and my party to carry the strain. The Prime Minister must reflect on that, too. Indeed, the problem is highlighted in the comments made at that press conference by the man who was returned to serve as the Member of Parliament for Mid-Ulster, but failed to do so. He said:

> "You see the big difference is this, Tony Blair has got to know us, David Trimble has yet to make that journey".

I would rephrase such sentiments. I have got to know Sinn Fein very well indeed. I hope that the Prime Minister gets to know Sinn Fein just as well and appreciates that things are not as simple as they seem. We shall wait for his judgments to be announced before Parliament rises, but I underline the need for the Government to get a grip of the situation and to recreate confidence in the community. I say firmly to the Government that, if they do not now tackle the continuing instability and create the necessary confidence, the prospects for next year are not good at all.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): We need to be honest about what is happening in Northern Ireland. That involves recognising the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), who talked about the progress that has been made through the Assembly and the Executive and what it is like to shop on the streets now compared with what it was like previously. Such matters need to be at the forefront of our minds.

We must also realise that many serious problems have emerged in Northern Ireland as the process has developed. Many people are detaching themselves from the commitment to the Belfast agreement. There are reasons for that, some of which were explained by the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire). We must be aware of them, because they lead to disillusionment within the Protestant camp. We must also bear in mind the behaviour of the paramilitaries, but to some extent they had an excuse for their actions. Their argument was that the means justified the end. They were either for a united Ireland or opposed to it.

The paramilitaries have degenerated from that unacceptable position into mafia-type organisations that operate for their own benefit. To some extent, the Real IRA has picked up the old mantle of the Provisional IRA and is raking money off for its own use. We must be aware of the lessons that we can learn from such problems.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North drew conclusions that were based on the arguments that he put forward. He does not want us to listen too much to other considerations, because he wants us to give great weight to the advances that have been made. Can we not recognise those advances while also recognising the difficulties? The problem with stressing the difficulties is that it encourages those who are trying to uncouple the whole agreement. We must try to exert pressure on paramilitary organisations in order to overcome the difficulties that exist in communities.

The report by the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, of which I am a member, on the funding of paramilitary organisations shows part of the way forward. It points out that if it were possible to cut off the funding of paramilitary organisations, they would be destroyed because they would not be able to carry out their political agenda or their mafia activity. The report suggests developing the work of the organised crime taskforce and the asset recovery agency, and ensuring that those organisations have the back up and funding available to equivalent bodies in the Republic of Ireland. Such matters need great consideration.

The final report of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee in the last Parliament was about paramilitary intimidation and the fact that many people are placed in exile. Some are exiled in the Republic of Ireland and some are in internal exile in Northern Ireland, but great wodges of people are exiled in Britain. That is unacceptable, and we must be concerned about such issues if we are to have a proper picture of what is occurring.

I suggest an action that the Government can take, which I hope is practical. They should have an all-embracing attitude to the situation in Northern Ireland. It is unfortunate that matters are too often left to the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Executive, with occasional interventions by the Prime Minister to nudge things along. Other Departments sometimes act as if Northern Ireland does not exist and should not be taken into account. The Treasury, in particular, has problems getting its head around the fact that Northern Ireland is a considerable section of the United Kingdom with massive problems.

The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee produced a report on the relatively minor issue of aggregate tax. It was obvious that the Treasury had not taken account of the impact of Northern Ireland's border on the introduction of aggregate tax. There have been many good arguments for the aggregate tax, but quarrying activities operate in the Republic and trade starts to transfer to Northern Ireland.

Current investigations by the Committee, which are based on a previous report, relate to the smuggling of petrol. Consideration should be given to the duty increases that affect Northern Ireland and the disparity that that causes with the Republic of Ireland. That is seen as a minor factor because only 3 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom live in Northern Ireland, and money is thrown at Customs and Excise to tackle the problem. We should grasp the wider issues.

It is important to pay attention to Northern Ireland, to be honest about what is happening, to listen to both sides of the argument, and not to use what is happening as a defence for the preconceived set of values that we happen to have.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have little time left before the witching hour of 12 o'clock. Three hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye, not all of whom heard the admonition that I gave earlier, which was that we need to hand over to the Front Bench spokespersons at midday. Moreover, not all of them have given prior indication to the Chair that they want to intervene. I shall try to give everyone a chance to speak, and I urge hon. Members to be brief, and to try to resist the temptation to make interventions.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley): I shall be brief. The hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) made a point about the levels of violence, but his definition of that was very narrow as he referred to the situation around Drumcree. The statistics from the police service make the overall picture clear: the levels of violence in Northern Ireland were higher in 2001–02 than they were in 1998, which was the year that the agreement was signed. That is an indisputable fact, and if we gloss over such facts, we will not address the problems. We should acknowledge the extent of the problems.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the streets being free from police officers. In my constituency, crime is markedly up: pensioners are being brutalised in their homes, police stations are under threat of closure, and patrols are being withdrawn from rural areas. Those are problems, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, as he must deal with policing matters in his own constituency. If the suggestion is that policing and crime issues have gone away, that is not the reality.

I have read the report from the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee on organised crime. All the paramilitary organisations raise huge sums. I have a concern about that, which the Minister might wish to address. I understand that only 10 officers in the police service are assigned to investigate organised crime by paramilitaries—that is, to deal with the matter in general, rather than with specific cases. That figure highlights a huge inequity when it is contrasted with the fact that 103 staff are employed by the police ombudsman's office to investigate the police. Ten times more people are employed to investigate the police than to investigate organised crime by paramilitaries, even though that is acknowledged to be an enormous problem. I hope that the Minister will address that point. We have the organised crime taskforce, but we need to do even more to tackle this problem, because the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) is right when he says that it will do the paramilitaries enormous damage if we hit their funding.

At the heart of the peace process are the Mitchell principles of democracy and non-violence, which were signed up to by all the participants in the negotiations that culminated in the Belfast agreement. The reality is that all the paramilitary organisations are in breach of those principles—by their actions and, in some cases, by their words. There is talk that we might need a new set of principles, or that we should beef up the Mitchell principles. I do not believe that we need to do that. I am entirely satisfied that the Mitchell principles are wholly adequate to deal with the issue of people moving from violence to peace and democracy. The difficulty is that the Government are failing to act on the breaches of those principles. That is at the heart of what the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) said in his opening remarks. It is time for the Government to take action on those breaches.

After the general election in the Republic of Ireland, the Irish Prime Minister said that he could not have Sinn Fein as a partner in his Government until the IRA disbanded. However, we in Northern Ireland are expected to accept a different standard: Sinn Fein can be in our Government while the IRA continue violence on the streets, engage in international terrorism in Colombia, and run guns from Florida and through Cuba. As the Assistant Chief Constable, Mr. McQuillan, said, it can orchestrate violence on the streets of Belfast, and yet the Government say that the ceasefire is intact, and that they need take no action. That is just plain wrong; the Government do need to act. If they are to restore confidence in the peace process, they have to sanction those parties and paramilitary organisations that are in default.

I recently heard the remarks of Richard Hass, President Bush's envoy, who suggested that we draw a line after events such as Colombia and Castlereagh, and create some new rules which we expect people to adhere to. I do not think that that is acceptable. We cannot draw a line after Colombia and other recent events, because that goes to the heart of the republican movement's intentions and its commitment to exclusively peaceful means. It also concerns the actions of loyalist paramilitaries on the streets and their commitment.

On 22 April 1998, before the referendum on the agreement, the Prime Minister told the House of Commons:

> "Meanwhile, it would obviously be a travesty of democracy if parties associated with paramilitary organisations"—[Official Report, 22 April 1998; Vol. 310, c. 812.]

continued in the Government of Northern Ireland while they were threatening or using violence. I agree with him, but I think that he has forgotten his words. The situation is a travesty of democracy, and it is time that that was addressed.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a few comments. I congratulate the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing the debate, and welcome his interest in the subject. It is important to endorse the trailer for the business of the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs that was given by my colleague from the Committee, the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), and its report on the funding of terrorism in particular. That report shows clearly that those organisations are active not just in getting funds but in the use of those funds for terrorist purposes.

The Belfast agreement is fatally flawed, and not simply on the basis of those features for which support is a matter of political judgment, such as the destruction of the Royal Ulster Constabulary—brought about by the agreement—the release of terrorist prisoners who had not served their sentences, the setting up of unaccountable executive all-Ireland bodies, and the representatives of the terror machine of the Provisional IRA's entry into government.

I am talking about the central principle of the agreement, which is that there should be cross-community support. That does not exist, and I would argue that it never has, but no one can say so definitively, because no one knows precisely what each section of the community did in the course of the referendum. All we know is that it was remarkably close in terms of whether the Unionist community voted for or against the agreement.

It was clear that the majority of those elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly from the Unionist community were elected on a manifesto that was opposed to the Belfast agreement, and that is what they told their electorate. I see the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) shaking his head. That is because some of the colleagues who stood for his party made it clear to the electorate that they were opposed to the principles that he stands for, and his support for the Belfast agreement.

The reality is that many of us who have been involved in politics in Northern Ireland for a long time will have seen various structures set up, and will have seen them fall. The Unionist community was happy with the old Stormont Parliament; the nationalist community was not, and no matter how much it may have been liked by the Unionist community, it did not have sufficient cross-community support for it to have life and be stable. It fell—a sad fact of life for Unionists. When the power-sharing Executive and the Council of Ireland were set up, the nationalist community received them happily, although the Unionist community did not. Again, for nationalists, the sad fact of life was that that process did not have the necessary cross-community support, and it fell.

I would have thought that that lesson would have been learned by the time that we entered into the current process. Indeed, the Deputy First Minister, Mr. Mark Durkan, and I travelled to South Africa with others to consider the experiences of that country, in particular the principle of sufficient consensus, which was built into its process. We tried to bring that back to Northern Ireland to ensure that whatever structures were set up would have sufficiently robust support from both sections of the community to be stable and lasting. That has not happened and, whatever the position might have been at the time of the referendum, the position now in relation to the Belfast agreement is overwhelmingly that the Unionist community does not give its support and has no confidence in the agreement.

The reality is all around us. The Unionist community does not support the agreement for a range of reasons, not simply because of the principles that I mentioned earlier which undermined that support, but in terms of the practice—how things have worked out on the ground. People can see that the Provisional IRA is not wedded to the peace process. Far from it: since its so-called ceasefire began, it has murdered 14 people, shot 160 people, carried out paramilitary beatings on 250 people, run guns in from Florida, carried out exercises in training narco-terrorists in Columbia, and raided the Castlereagh special branch offices to gather information so that it can better target people. It has even targeted members of the Conservative party.

In my own constituency, five Protestants have been shot by the Provisional IRA. We have seen the interface violence in which IRA members have been engaged as well as the ongoing rackets and other work at that level within the community. One would expect none of the activities that I listed from an organisation wedded to a peace process. We have a Minister of Education who is responsible for looking after young children in Northern Ireland. In his other capacity, he sits down as a member of the army council of the Provisional IRA and takes the decisions to do the things in my catalogue of activities. That can never inspire confidence within the community, and it is not acceptable.

Decommissioning has not happened. More guns have been coming into the IRA stockpile than have been going out at the other end. Clearly, there is no basis on which the Unionist community could have confidence in the process. We will never have a stable political structure in Northern Ireland until we renegotiate the basis of the agreement and have one that is balanced and capable of enjoying the support of Unionists as well as of nationalists.

David Burnside (South Antrim): I was not involved in the negotiation of the Belfast agreement—there is no reason why I should have been because I was not an elected Member of any House or an adviser—apart from a telephone call that I had from Mo on Good Friday. She told me, "We've written a letter from Tony to David," because my party was having problems signing the agreement. She said, "Use whatever influence you have to send a message through to Castle buildings."

I do not think that my message went through, but when I read the content of Tony's letter to David, I thought, "That helps the ambiguities that are inherent within this agreement". The promises have not been delivered. I went along with the Blair promises and ambiguities. As a Unionist in Northern Ireland, I voted for the agreement along with almost the majority of the traditional Protestant community as well as the Catholics who vote unionist with a small "u", who should not be forgotten.

I humbly suggest to the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) that a better description for this debate would have been Northern Ireland political rather than peace process, because it is the political process that is failing. All the elected representatives in Northern Ireland—all who take our seats in the House—want the peace process and to get away from the past 30 years of tension, sectarian violence and terrorism from all directions. What emerges from the Select Committee report is the increase in criminality that happens through the front of the terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland. Hon. Members should read the report if they have not done so. It has not been widely reported in the press, and should be reported much more widely.

We need a new political process. Decommissioning is now a farce. Under the Mitchell principles for the destruction of the paramilitary terrorist organisations, delivery should have been completed after two years. The Government have now disgracefully made the deadline 2008, which will have no effect because there is no sanction. Decommissioning is a farce, which is now more to the advantage of Sinn Fein-IRA than to the democrats in the political and peace process. The deadline has no sanction.

My neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson), referred to the Mitchell principles. We need nothing better; they are admirable. They need to be implemented, and they need sanction. They are not being delivered on. For Sinn Fein in government, please read the report. I wanted to believe that terrorists could move from terrorism and holding an Armalite in one hand and the ballot box in the other to holding just the ballot box, but that is not working. The system at Stormont is not as accountable as was promised.

The Secretary of State throws across in his Parkhead style to us on the Unionist Benches the message that there is no alternative, but there is. The alternative is involving Ulster Unionists, Democratic Unionists and the SDLP and excluding Sinn Fein from the process because it is not fit to be part of the democratic process or in government. Martin McGuinness has no remorse or regret for his involvement in terrorism and is still involved in it. He should not be put in that position. The process is not working. We need a fundamental renegotiation of the Belfast agreement.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): I thank the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) for having made the discussion possible. I am pleased that his party has abandoned its short-lived withdrawal from the cross-party consensus on Northern Ireland. That always struck me as an unsustainable position, and it is to the Conservative party's credit that it is inside, rather than outside, that process.

Liberal Democrats have always been firm supporters of the Good Friday agreement, because it is necessary to use such an agreement to provide legitimate institutions of government in a deeply divided society. The agreement reflects many aspects of policies that Liberal Democrats have long felt to be important, including devolution, power-sharing institutions, accountable north-south structures, the principle of consent and civil liberties. By itself, however, the agreement amounts only to conflict management. Strategies must be developed to move from conflict management to conflict transformation, and ultimately conflict resolution, if the new dispensation is to prove durable.

Those deep divisions in Northern Ireland society have yet to be tackled. The difficulty is that in many ways the phrasing of the Good Friday agreement has institutionalised the assumption of two communities, an issue that I have often raised. It is all very well to say that the two communities are equal but separate, living in peaceful but separated co-existence. The state beyond that—true normality—is when we regard Northern Ireland as one community that is nevertheless diverse and when everyone in Northern Ireland respects the variations and different beliefs and creeds that it contains. Until we reach that point, we have a hostage to fortune that inevitably wells up as visible stress in the streets of the Province when divisions are manifested in face-to-face conflicts.

Nevertheless, huge progress has been made. I take a different view from that of the hon. Member for East Devon on Drumcree. It is closer to the position of the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). We should praise the Orange Order for having taken a strategic, measured and sensible approach by de-escalating the issues.

Let us make no mistake. The troubles on Sunday were caused largely by maverick, anti-agreement loyalists mainly from east and south Antrim, not the Orange Order. It is important to emphasise that, because the Orange Order's actions show its willingness not only to move forward from the past but to take a sensible and measured approach towards grievances that it has the right to raise, but that it is now raising within a political framework. It is incumbent on nationalists and republicans in the Drumcree area to reciprocate, and I am optimistic that, if they do so, they will receive a positive response.

In that sense, I am more optimistic than the hon. Member for East Devon, but it is clear that there are flaws in the implementation of the agreement. Those flaws are manifested in the continuing strains and the intensity of conflict that we still see in certain places. Few, if any, of the outstanding issues are now matters of principle, and they are certainly not intractable.

There are matters ranging from how we interpret the Good Friday agreement right through to the degree to which various parties have been able to implement their side of the bargain. Those issues remain tense. However, we should remember that all the pro-agreement parties have—nominally, at least—supported the goals of decommissioning, stabilising the institutions, police reform and security normalisation. There have been problems of interpretation and sequencing, debating who is responsible for implementing the actions and—to a degree—the absence of trust, which causes various parties to feel that if they do move, they will be regarded as losing to the victorious other side. The spirit of compromise and accommodation that made the Good Friday agreement possible is perhaps absent to some extent now.

Related to that is the inability of the paramilitaries to provide sufficient confidence in the durability of their ceasefires through the decommissioning of weapons and the ending of violence. The consequences of that are manifest for all to see. In effect, republican and loyalist paramilitaries need to demonstrate in a much more factual and practical way willingness to trust their political representatives in the political process. Until they do that, there is just cause for grievance on both sides as things fail to move forward. Although I have always felt that the decommissioning of weapons is primarily a symbolic action, I would say that it is very important. The paramilitaries need only consider the benefit that they received by doing that in a rational and organised way, to see that they would help their own side by continuing on that basis.

We have already heard during today's debate that there are pressures on parties, including the Ulster Unionists and—I suppose—Sinn Fein, with regard to how far they can push their hardline members without causing fractures in their organisations. There is no point pretending that that is not happening, but one of the challenges for the Government is to make it as easy as possible for the pro-agreement elements on all sides to negotiate in their own organisations and argue the case, as I attempted to just now, that an inclusive philosophy requires a degree of vulnerability resulting from the giving up of some of the traditional norms in the relevant organisations.

That means that the Government's proposal to handle "on the runs" in a particular way has to be considered in the context of what can be sold to the various parties in Northern Ireland. I am very concerned that what looks like a de facto amnesty for "on the runs" is not symmetrical. It does not take account of the pressures in the loyalist and unionist communities to see parity of treatment. The institutionalism of ethnic divisions is a danger because many people do not regard themselves as members of the Protestant or Catholic communities.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and others have felt that a fundamental renegotiation of the Good Friday agreement is required. I do not share that view. I feel that the agreement itself is not bad, as long as sufficient flexibility and trust is generated on both sides to give a little bit of space for those negotiating on behalf of the different sides to implement it in a gentle but progressive fashion. In effect, the agreement requires a shared, non-sectarian Northern Ireland with a more united community than that of separate but equal groups. I would be interested to hear the Minister's views on how the Government can smooth our way from a time of stabilising separate groups to an integrated society where those groups live together. Integrated education is important in that context, and so is mixed housing. Those policies need a drive by the Government to become reality. I do not underestimate the tensions involved in doing that, but perhaps that is the single biggest lever that the British Government, working with the Irish Government, can offer.

Human rights are important. Individuals should feel that their rights as individuals, not just as members of collective groups, are upheld. It is necessary to develop a coherent and devolved strategy for Northern Ireland—indeed, for the whole of the British Isles—that would make it easy for individuals to express their identity without having to be forced back into one section of their communities. The Minister might want to say something on that.

Finally, I accept that reforms need to be made to the agreement, but those reforms should take account of such things as the very entrenched voting system in Stormont that caused the Alliance party to have to redesignate in order to play the game of achieving certain shared results in Northern Ireland.

I have raised questions to which I hope the Minister can respond, but let us remember that the whole debate is in the context of the forthcoming 2003 elections. The clock is ticking, and the more that the Government can do now to remove the divisions, the more optimistic I will be that we will have pro-agreement manifestos in abundance during next year's elections in Northern Ireland.

12.10 pm

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): First, I should like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) on securing this debate and on his excellent speech introducing it. I would want to expropriate nearly all of it for the Front Bench, shortly before he is expropriated in person for the Front Bench, given the quality of his presentation today.

It is inappropriate that this debate is happening in this second-division Chamber at this time. Although I commend right hon. and hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland constituencies for attending in a first-division manner, the fact is that this debate should be taking place on the Floor of the main Chamber of the House of Commons, with contributions from the Prime Minister and the principal spokesmen for the other parties.

David Burnside: As the Prime Minister has given a commitment to make an announcement to the House by 24 July, no doubt by means of a statement, will the hon. Gentleman ask the Government to give the House the opportunity for a full debate on the subject?

Mr. Blunt: I would certainly prefer a full debate, but I shall ask the Government this morning for a commitment to a statement to the House by the Prime Minister before we rise on 24 July. I understand that the Prime Minister has given such an undertaking, but I should like the Minister explicitly to repeat that this morning.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Devon has made it clear that relations between the communities on the ground, particularly at interface points, have got worse. The evidence of that is the building of walls—the spread of walls and the increase in their height. They are a shame on a modern European city, a city that aspires to be the European city of culture in 2008, but that is what is happening to the physical geography of Belfast.

The hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) demolished his own case when he said that the IRA has honoured its ceasefire as it sees it. I am afraid that that is not the test. The right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) made a point about the need for sanctions. It is for the Government to come forward with those details, but I shall have some suggestions on that towards the end of my remarks. I commend the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) on his balanced and honest approach—an approach that we have come to expect from him—to all the problems in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) drew our attention to the important work done by the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs and the need for the Government to increase the resources to be given to the recovery of assets from criminals. As the Committee said, it is unacceptable for 40 officers of the Gardai to be devoted to that, but only 10 in Northern Ireland. I assume that those are the figures to which the hon. Member was referring. That is, of course, not the totality of people devoted to the attack on organised crime, but that unit is extremely important and needs urgently to be reinforced.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), in his customary way, gave us a full catalogue of the activities of an organisation not wedded to peace. It is very difficult to gainsay the evidence that he adduced. The hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside) referred to the ambiguities in the agreement. I must tell the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) that the Conservative party has been wedded to the aim of finding a solution to the problems in Northern Ireland and, during its terms in office, produced the Sunningdale agreement under Sir Edward Heath and the Anglo-Irish agreement under my right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Thatcher, and played an active part in the current peace process, which I would argue began under my right hon. and noble Friend, Lord Brooke, when he was Secretary of State. My right hon. Friends the Members for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), the then Leader of the Opposition, and for Bracknell (Mr. MacKay), the then shadow Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, campaigned alongside the Prime Minister and the then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for a yes vote in 1998.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): I respect the hon. Gentleman for his comments about his party's commitment to the continuation of the peace process. In that connection, I sincerely regret a facetious comment that I made when leaving a meeting yesterday, which referred to the hon. Gentleman. I withdraw it entirely and without reservation.

Mr. Blunt: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that handsome withdrawal of an appalling remark. He and I are now roughly in balance. Once or twice my sense of humour has got the better of my sense of judgment, so I accept his full apology.

Lembit Öpik: I praise what the Conservatives have done in the past, particularly John Major, who was instrumental in the current process. However, I was concerned earlier this year when I understood that the Conservatives were pulling out of the cross-party agreement. They sound as if they are now on board, for which I have unequivocal praise.

Mr. Blunt: We have always been on board, and it is the hon. Gentleman's understanding that has been at a loss.

The Belfast agreement, on which the whole peace process is built, was based on a commitment by the parties to end violence. The assumption was that Sinn Fein would deliver the IRA, and that was not an unreasonable assumption to make since the people who represent Sinn Fein, as the hon. Member for Belfast, East made clear, are by and large the same people who sit on the army council of the Provisional IRA. The agreement was sold to the people of Northern Ireland by the Prime Minister, and the Minister will remember his speech at the Balmoral show ground, which bears repeating. The Prime Minister said:

> "The problem is this: I believe that most people would be ready to accept even the hardest parts of the Agreement if they had genuine confidence that the paramilitaries were really ready to give up violence for good. I welcome Sinn Fein's endorsement of the Agreement and all that it implies. This is a historic shift. But after the experiences of the last 30 years, and some recent statements about no decommissioning, it is hardly surprising that for many, that confidence is simply not there."

I refer right hon. and hon. Members to the comments that followed:

> "These factors will provide evidence upon which to base an overall judgment—a judgment which will necessarily become more rigorous over time."

That was the basis on which people in Northern Ireland voted for the agreement. I do not know why that speech has disappeared from the No. 10 website, or why it is no longer referred to. I sincerely hope that, given its importance, it will be listed again by No. 10 as one of the Prime Minister's seminal speeches.

What has happened over the past four years? We have had the procurement of weapons in Florida, and weapons testing has been carried out in Columbia in conjunction with narco-terrorists, with appalling consequences for the Columbian people. Updated targeting information has been uncovered, and shooting and beatings have risen since 1998. Most regrettably of all, we have witnessed the attitude of Sinn Fein's leadership to the Police Service of Northern Ireland, which is a key and symbolic test. When the chairman of Sinn Fein was not prepared to condemn the attempted murder of a Catholic recruit to the PSNI, what message did he send to the whole community of Northern Ireland about Sinn Fein's commitment to peace? I said to him yesterday that it remains absolutely necessary for him to make it clear that Sinn Fein abhors violence and is fully committed to peace. If he will not do that, what conclusion are people expected to draw when they hear Gerry Adams say that the PSNI will be treated the same as the RUC?

Everyone knows what conclusions they should draw. The judgments that have to be applied to Sinn Fein and the republicans are different from those that have to be applied to loyalists. The Progressive Unionist party and the Ulster Democratic party, which no longer exists, are not in government. I have heard the leadership of the PUP be more explicit in its condemnation of loyalist violence from its community than Sinn Fein ever has of violence coming from the republican community.

The Government face three options. The ideal option is for Sinn Fein to show leadership and condemn violence in the republican community, and to make it unequivocally clear that it is fully committed to the peaceful, democratic process. That is what we are looking for, and it can show leadership by further acts of decommissioning, joining the Policing Board and taking a constructive attitude towards the police in Northern Ireland. It can even show leadership in the language that it uses to the republican and nationalist community in Northern Ireland. The SDLP has already bravely given such leadership.

If that does not happen the Government will have to show leadership and deliver on the Prime Minister's Balmoral speech, which is the second option. If the Government do not deliver, we will look to the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist party, which have been fully committed to the democratic process, to exercise their responsibilities, which is the third option. However, it should not be left to them.

It is now down to the Prime Minister again to show the leadership that he used in negotiating the Belfast agreement four years ago. He should make it clear that in word and in spirit the Belfast agreement and the peace process will continue.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): The hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) deserves our gratitude for offering us an opportunity to debate a subject that rightly generates passion and interest across the House. He further deserves our compliments for the thoughtful and eloquent way in which he opened the debate. In his speech he displayed a depth of understanding of the issues that set the scene for this debate at—I would be the first to concede this—such a difficult time.

The hon. Gentleman made a point to which I should like to refer before I deal with the wider issues. He and other hon. Members referred to the Select Committee report, which is very interesting and I commend it to those who have not read it. The Select Committee says that it has > "been encouraged by the evidence . . . that the Government is tackling" organised crime and links to paramilitarism and are > "developing powerful and effective strategies to counter them".

It also says:

> "Those who are actively engaged in the difficult and dangerous work of tackling paramilitaries and serious criminals have a right to expect not only a formal commitment to their work but properly resourced support by Government for the long term."

The report is weighty and comes from a serious Select Committee that has done some serious work. I should like members of the Committee who are present to accept that the Government take the recommendations in that enormously interesting report seriously.

It is not possible to draw a straight numerical comparison between what the Government are doing in Northern Ireland to tackle organised crime and policing in the Republic of Ireland. I shall say this about the way in which the PSNI tackle organised crime. Two reserve police officers on duty in Newry in the middle of the night spotted a suspicious vehicle that was dripping oil. They were unable to stop the vehicle, but they followed the trail of oil and discovered a fuel laundering plant that was laundering 1 million litres of fuel each month, which was creating a £500,000 loss to the Exchequer. One cannot say that the number of officers that the Chief Constable of Northern Ireland allocates to tackling organised crime is insufficient, because the whole of the PSNI turns its hand to tackling organised crime and deserves to be commended.

I shall now deal with the main subject, which is the general future of the peace process in Northern Ireland. The debate comes when we are confronted with significant challenges for the implementation of the agreement, which must be met before we can move ahead and make further progress. As we promised, we are considering how we overcome the challenges. We must overcome them, because the process can only go forward on the basis of commitment to entirely peaceful methods by those who are engaged in it. The Belfast agreement has brought us a long way, but it has the potential to take us much further, and we must hold to that fact.

As we become more distant from the awful days before the ceasefires, it is easy to forget what a transformation there has been in many aspects of life in Northern Ireland. My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) was right to refer to the achievements that the agreement has made possible.

The most obvious development is that there is less violence. There is still too much street violence, and too many murders and scenes such as the utterly indefensible displays at Drumcree on Sunday. That is unacceptable. I should like to make it clear that the Government do not believe that there is any acceptable level of violence. Nevertheless, the contrast between what we have now and the days of the all-out terrorist campaigns is striking. There is too much violence—we could discuss the average number of deaths and so on—but it is important to hold to the fact that there have been many fewer deaths. In that context, what happened on Sunday in Drumcree must be kept in perspective and, for that reason, the comments of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) are very telling.

The two acts of IRA decommissioning were of enormous symbolic significance and should not be dismissed lightly. The second was acknowledged by the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning to involve a "varied and substantial" quantity of weapons.

Lady Hermon rose—

Jane Kennedy: If the hon. Lady will forgive me, I shall resist interventions, because I have very little time left to deal with these very serious issues.

There has also been a massive rapprochement between political points of view, which for so many years have been in diametric opposition. A great deal of economic improvement has taken place. It has been under way for some years, but the prospect of peace has done a great deal to accelerate and embed it. Belfast has a vibrancy and character like never before. On a Saturday night in the city centre, hundreds of young people from all backgrounds visit clubs, pubs and restaurants and talk and laugh on the streets, as one would expect in any prosperous, up-and-coming city centre anywhere in the United Kingdom. The Government have done all that they can to sustain the process of economic development.

The Government and others have made enormous efforts to implement the agreement. However, the unfolding of the implementation process has given rise to legitimate concerns, which have grown in recent months. We must acknowledge that the benefits that I just mentioned have not been fully enjoyed by all in Northern Ireland. As has been too frequently and chillingly depicted on our television screens, there are areas in which reconciliation and partnership appear to be a remote prospect.

I acknowledge that hope has become tarnished as anxiety has grown that there may be a less full-hearted commitment—I put it no stronger than that—to peace and partnership among players on both sides of the community than we had hoped for at one stage. Such concerns have been at the centre of discussions between the political parties and Governments, including the proceedings at Hillsborough last week, which were led by the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach.

In the minute that I have left, I shall not go into the detail of the Government's thinking on the issues, nor shall I give the commitments that have been sought today. The Government must be permitted to take all the issues seriously and to respond carefully, as we promised we would in the commitment that we made last Thursday. I am grateful to the hon. Member for East Devon for giving us the opportunity to debate the issues.

Flood Defences

12.30 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): I make no apologies for returning to a subject on which I secured an Adjournment debate, to which the Minister responded, just before the last general election. I do not apologise partly because the subject is a matter of considerable concern in my constituency—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. It would be courteous to the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) if post mortems on the previous debate were held outside this Chamber.

Mr. Todd: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Local people in South Derbyshire continue to be worried about the issue. In winter 2000, there were incursions into the communities of Hatton, Willington, Shardlow and Barrow upon Trent, and several smaller incursions into other communities, that caused damage to private property and made local people anxious about their future. They were worried about their possessions, livelihoods and whether they would be able to continue to live in their chosen area. Since then, the community of Hatton, in particular, has benefited substantially from investment in repairing existing flood defences, raising flood defences to more appropriate levels, and in ongoing provision of new flood defences, which should be completed next month. Severn Trent, the area's sewerage company, has engaged in a positive programme to improve the sewerage network to prevent a flow back of sewage into people's houses, which had distressing and damaging effects in 2000.

Progress has been made and I commend the work that has been done. Incidentally, I also commend the strategic review that has just started on the Trent catchment area. The scoping document has come to me and the review should lead to a clearer strategy for the area—perhaps next year. That will be very welcome. My constituency is crossed by the Dove, Trent and Derwent rivers and by several minor brooks, which are also prone to flooding. Flood defences are a key priority of the people of South Derbyshire, but I want to paint a wider picture.

It is important to recognise that floods are a national problem of considerable scale. Hundreds of people in South Derbyshire faced the loss of their homes during part of the winter of 2000, and 10,000 homes throughout the country were affected in that way. Many communities outside South Derbyshire are anxious about the prospect of winter.

The insurance industry has signalled its willingness to continue to renew policies in areas that are considered to be flood risks until the end of the year. However, it is ringing alarm bells about the prospect of continuing to offer that service for citizens of such areas beyond that date unless the Government take various steps. I shall address those steps later.

In a question to the Prime Minister, I referred to the insurance company esure's announcement that it will not offer insurance products to people in areas at risk of floods. Several insurance companies have already taken action. I have corresponded with Norwich Union, for example, about difficulties that my constituents have experienced when trying to renew insurance products. Alarm bells are ringing and if they are not addressed, people's ability to sustain a reasonable standard of living in these communities will be affected. It is essential that householders can purchase at reasonable cost insurance products that can secure their property and its contents against flood risk. If that is not available, these communities will become less sustainable.

The overall picture of funding of flood defences is addressed in one of the key arguments that the insurance sector has advanced. If we refer to the evidence on expenditure on flood and coastal defences that was given to the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee—of which I am a member—in 2001, in the current year £414 million is expected to be spent on flood defences by a variety of agencies. It is important to stress that that is not only Government expenditure, but also expenditure that is authorised through local authorities. However, research sponsored by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs states that longer-term funding of £565 million per year is required simply to maintain current standards of defences, to improve them to acceptable levels and to mitigate predictable climate change impacts. Therefore, there is a spending gap that desperately needs to be addressed.

We now know that the Chancellor will announce the spending round next week and I am well aware that the Department has made representations on this subject in the spending review. I do not expect my hon. Friend the Minister to be able to give me an answer as to precisely what the contents of that review will be—he is shaking his head, as I expected. However, I hope that he can at least give some favourable indication as to how the concerns that the Department has expressed have been received by the Treasury.

It is fair to say—I always try to be fair—that expenditure on flood defences has increased in the past couple of years. Nevertheless, according to the data that the Department itself provided, this gap exists and we should try to deal with it.

The next issue will also be familiar to my hon. Friend—the organisational complexity of how that money is used and how we get results from it. I have always found it bizarre that there are about 600 organisations in this country that have some say in how flood defences are managed. I also find it strange that many of them have no clear statutory duty to carry out any particular tasks that are critical to the delivery of flood defences. Therefore, we had the astonishing example—which my hon. Friend will recall, because he had to answer a series of written parliamentary questions from me about it—of the failure of local authorities to co-operate with the Environment Agency in the inspection of ditches and watercourses, even though it is their responsibility to inspect them and to ensure that they are properly maintained. I was staggered by the evidence that a large number of local authorities had responded by saying either that they did not have the resources to do the job or that they did not have the expertise to do it and that it would therefore have to be postponed until a more appropriate time or until they could find such expertise. That is unacceptable.

Providing information on flood risk in local communities is a crucial task. Sadly, it is not the case that all of the local authorities that responded in that way had had no experience of flood risk. There is a list of the local authorities that responded in that way; I will not run through it, but it is on the record, and a glance at it will show several communities where flood risk was a fairly recent experience and yet their local authorities were unable to do those jobs.

I attended a meeting that my hon. Friend the Minister addressed in which he said that the system is extremely complicated but it works—I suppose that it depends on what one means by works. The English way of administration is normally described as muddling through. We provide an extremely complicated way of doing something and, because we are all well-intentioned people who are innovative in our ways, we get across problems and barriers and produce an outcome that most people are prepared to accept.

No one would suggest that the organisation of flood defences is optimal. In Scotland, for example, local authorities are obliged to carry out various tasks relating to the inspection and maintenance of areas of flood risk for which they are responsible, but there is no matching responsibility in England. We may wish local authorities to take on that responsibility, but it is up to their electors to decide whether it is a priority for expenditure. There is not even an obligation to spend money set aside in revenue support to a local authority on the task for which it was intended. The Government's statistics contain information on the amount of money that local authorities are supposed to spend on floods, flood defences and flood protection, but we have no way of knowing whether that money has been spent or whether it matches the amount of money that is needed. We might have tolerated that sort of spatchcock muddle at a time when the risk of flooding was lower, but it is no longer acceptable.

It is clearly necessary to change the way in which we tackle the matter. We need to provide clearer executive leadership to the management of flood defences in this country, and in my view such leadership should be vested in the Environment Agency. Those who are supposed to be co-operating with the agency in its task should be under a clear statutory obligation to do the things that they are supposed to do to ensure that such activity is not optional or voluntary. There needs to be a more resilient framework for dealing with those problems.

Although it is clear that the risk that lies ahead is not readily quantifiable, it is substantial. The research commissioned from the Centre for Ecology and Hydrology and the Met Office by DEFRA indicates that in the past 50 years there has been a significant increase in the incidence of heavy rainfall and peak river flow. Although those organisations cannot directly link that increase to climate change because we do not have enough data, they say that the changes are consistent with predicted climate change. We have been warned and must take clear action.

My final point returns to the local perspective. We all have a role in flood defence, and that includes landowners and developers who want to use ground that lies in flood risk areas. We desperately need better quality maps to show where those areas are. The Environment Agency readily concedes that its current maps are incomplete and not necessarily very accurate. The insurance industry often uses postcodes to indicate flood risk, which is extremely inaccurate. We need a more authoritative base on which to decide those things. We also need clearly to define the policy that applies to those areas.

In Scotland, virtually no development is taking place in flood risk areas, which is partly because there are additional call-in powers if a development is proposed. In England, there is still significant new development on flood plains. Another issue is how one deals with the replacement of existing development. We all have responsibility: landowners, the Government, private individuals living in the affected areas and insurance providers as well. In that context, more money and a clearer organisational framework are required.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): I am grateful to the Minister and the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) for allowing me a short intervention during this Adjournment debate. I have three quick questions for the Minister. First, we know that so far this year we have had historically high rainfall. The acquifers are full and the ground is saturated and, in October, there will be an astronomical high tide. What reassurance can the Minister give that there will not be massive flooding during October?

Secondly, does the Minister believe that more should be done—and if so, what—to encourage the use of natural or "soft" flood defences? Thirdly, one of the problems is that flood water is not egressing into the sea because rivers are inadequately dredged. Would the Minister detail what improvements there have been in the dredging of the mouths of tidal rivers?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on securing the debate. He has been very active on the issue of flood defence, including the institutional arrangements and funding. I know that it is a particular interest in his constituency, as he has outlined during the debate. He has also been a very active participant in the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which produced a good report on flood and coastal defence. That report influenced the Government's examination of the institutional arrangements. He will be aware of our funding review, to which he made a very constructive response. We are looking at the institutional arrangements, as well as the way that we raise funding, so that we have a more transparent system.

I stand by what I said to the all-party flood defence group. I was pleased that that group was set up. It was a very useful opportunity to discuss the issues. Given the risks in this country—an island surrounded by sea with high rainfall—our record in flood and coastal defence stands up in comparison with any other country, and is better than many. I know that that is no consolation to those who have been affected by flooding, and I make that absolutely clear.

In response to one of the questions from the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed), I do believe that there is more that we can do. We intend to do more and natural defences are certainly an option that we are embracing in the range of options that we are considering for flood and coastal defence. There has been high rainfall recently, although there was quite a dry spell in the spring, and I have had no reports that there is a serious cause for concern in relation to acquifer levels. All the factors, including tidal surges, are monitored regularly by the Environment Agency and local authorities. We have a contingency plan for dealing with them. On dredging, the Environment Agency does carry that out, and it can be a useful measure in relation to water courses, but it is not that useful in tidal estuaries. Whatever is taken out of a tidal estuary is simply filled up by the volume of the sea and has a limited effect, so it depends on where the dredging takes place. I am often asked about dredging, but it is much more limited than some people think.

In response to my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire, we are going ahead with the review. We will be publishing our proposals in the autumn detailing what people have said to us and our response. Many responses have been very helpful and constructive. People feel that many of the recommendations in the funding review are desirable. Some examples include the connection charge, regional customer bodies, an operating authority to be the sole service provider, and expert advisers for regional customer bodies with the possibility of subcontracting works to local authorities and the internal drainage boards. The review also suggested how we could streamline arrangements in the short term, including transferring to the Environment Agency responsibility for managing critical ordinary watercourses, blocking grant payments for some or all of the present funding delivered to the agency by the Government and removal of one of the tiers of flood defence committees. The flood plain levy, about which my hon. Friend was concerned, was not an option favoured in the funding review from the very beginning and it is no surprise to me that it is not favoured in the responses. We consulted on the proposals and will respond in due course.

I want to speak briefly about esure, which my hon. Friend mentioned. We spoke in some detail and had a constructive engagement with the Association of British Insurers. I have said on many occasions that we have the same agenda, which is to reduce the risk for people in this country. No one can guarantee that flooding will not happen, but we can do and are doing a great deal about flood risks. To be blunt, it was a bit of a cheek for esure to state publicly that it would not provide insurance in flood risk areas. We are not aware that it has ever provided significant insurance in flood risk areas. The company is entitled to cherry-pick customers and go for low-risk business in a competitive market, but its attempt at what many in the industry felt was a publicity stunt has seriously backfired. The company has come in for considerable criticism from consumers and industry bodies. It did not pull out of the market—it was not actually in it—but used the situation as an excuse to draw attention to its market decision.

I was surprised by a recent statement from esure that it would provide insurance in some flood-risk areas in Scotland but not in England. That did not come as a total surprise, as it is a Glasgow-based Scottish company, but what was a surprise was the seeming lack of understanding about the differences between Scottish and English approaches to flood and coastal defence and the comparative risks.

The approaches are not dissimilar in terms of planning, but investment commitments are very different. For example, the total spend on flood and coastal defence in Scotland is about £10 million a year on capital and £2 million a year on revenue. In England, we spend a combined total of more than £400 million. In the 40 years since 1961, 60 schemes have been approved in Scotland. More than twice that number are approved each year in England. Since the floods of 2000, my Department has approved a total of 274 new flood and coastal schemes, at an approved cost of £386,417,694. That is the difference in scale.

Those figures are not meant to criticise Scotland but to put in perspective the differences between the two countries. I cannot say that I am very impressed with esure's arguments, and I am not at all sympathetic to the fact that it has come out of the episode with some damage to its reputation.

Mr. Todd: While my hon. Friend is on the subject of comparisons with Scotland, will he discuss the primary legislation that exists in Scotland but not in England that obliges local authorities to perform various duties in respect of flood defence?

Mr. Morley: I am grateful that my hon. Friend raised that matter, because such legislation does not exist in Scotland. There is no duty to undertake capital works in Scotland, in the same way that there is no duty to do so in England. There is a duty to carry out maintenance of watercourses if they represent a risk of flooding in urban areas and there is, in effect, a duty to maintain the existing defences in our country through the regional flood defence committees, but there is no real difference between the two countries. I am not aware that Scotland has agreed to the higher defence standards that have been proposed by the ABI.

It is not the case that there are different statutory obligations in Scotland and England. There are some differences in the way that the organisation is put in place for flood planning. I do not believe, however, that the way in which we provide, for example, flood risk mapping, which is taken into account by local authorities in their structure plans, causes a difference in outcome. However, we have an open mind on such matters. We are talking to the ABI and proposing further future investment. In this country, we are always seeking to improve our organisation and the way that we do things, with the objective of reducing the risk to our population.

My hon. Friend mentioned local authority participation in flood defence inspections, a fair point to raise. Those inspections are part of the series of high-level targets that we have set to ensure that defences and watercourses are properly inspected by the bodies and agencies that have operational responsibility for them. I hope to be able to publish shortly a report from the Environment Agency on the results of those inspections and the part that local authorities have played in them. Of course, any local authorities that have not played that part will be identified, although many that had not sent in reports have subsequently done so. There has been some catching-up on the targets set.

In the longer term, one option being considered under the funding review, as my hon. Friend knows, is for critical ordinary watercourses to become the responsibility of the Environment Agency. I want to consider that option very carefully, in the light of information received through the high-level targets. I know that my hon. Friend and other organisations and bodies have raised responsibility for non-main critical watercourses. There will have to be some adjustments—there might be some main watercourses that are not critical, which could be de-mained. There are also financial implications for the Environment Agency, which we will have to take into account. That option may well improve the way in which those watercourses are dealt with. Although they are often small, they can account for quite serious flooding. We are aware of that and that option would be part of the overall approach that we are taking to reduce such risk.

As my hon. Friend rightly concluded, I am not yet in a position to comment on our spending review 2002 bid, although I expect to be able to do so in the not-too-distant future. Spending on the commitments that we have made to flood and coastal defence in this country has risen. For example, between 1996–97 and 2003–04—the end of our current spending review period—total Government expenditure is expected to increase from £309.7 million to £414.2 million in cash terms, an increase of nearly 34 per cent. That reflects the considerable extra money put into flood and coastal defence as a result of the floods in 2000 and the exceptional rainfall experienced then.

My hon. Friend is right to say that, while we cannot yet say that there is a long-term trend towards higher rainfall and climate change, we must plan for that. We must look at the worst-case scenarios and ensure that they are factored into our future planning and financial commitments. We have research and development budgets that are committed to climate forecasting and trying to gain a better understanding of potential climate change and what that might mean for this country in the long term. The Government and my Department are funding and supporting a number of projects. We are also investing heavily in flood warning, investment that has increased significantly with the £100 million committed over the next 10 years through the Environment Agency.

Mr. Todd: While my hon. Friend is touching on that subject, will he refer to my comment on the need for better mapping to show exactly where flood risks occur?

Mr. Morley: I accept that need. The flood risk mapping that the Environment Agency has put in place and made publicly available is a great advantage, but it is not 100 per cent. accurate and the Environment Agency has never claimed that that is the case. I am very impressed with the work that Norwich Union is doing on digital mapping, which is much more accurate. We are keen to co-operate with such involvement to improve information so that people can ascertain risk and we can work, through our investment, which is at record levels, to continue to reduce that risk in this country.

Meat Exports (European Union)

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus): It is perhaps appropriate that this debate is being held today, when the European Commission is due to publish proposals on changes to the common agricultural policy. This debate focuses on one aspect where commonality has clearly failed, due to certain Governments' actions to protect their own country's farming interests.

In this debate, I intend to cover two main points: the position of Scottish beef exports to Europe and the dangers posed to Scottish lamb exports to France. I imagine that the Minister does not need me to go into any great detail on the ban of beef exports to the European Union in the wake of the BSE crisis. Suffice it to say that Germany had lifted its ban by March 2000, leaving only France banning beef imports, a position that it still maintains. All other European Union countries now allow the import of beef, although, obviously, the amount being exported is well down compared with pre-BSE exports.

I note that Jim Walker of the Scottish National Farmers Union was reported in the Daily Record on 18 March 2000 as commenting on Germany's lifting of the ban:

> "Ministers must now work to increase the amount of beef we can export".

Since then, we have been visited by the disaster of foot and mouth, although Scotland, with the exception of Dumfries and Galloway and a small part of the border area, did not suffer as much as other parts of the United Kingdom. Since then, however, I understand that there have been hardly any beef exports from the UK at all.

My first question to the Minister is to ask what action his Department has taken, in conjunction with the Scottish Executive, to restart and increase the amount of Scottish beef being exported to Europe. What plans does he have to take that forward during the next 12 months?

The Minister should be aware that there is rising disbelief in Scotland that France is continuing to get away with banning Scottish beef imports, when the incidence of BSE in Scotland was never high—in fact, it is rising in France while it is falling in Scotland. In the UK in 1999, there were 2,133 reported cases of BSE but only 35 of those, compared with 93 the previous year, were in Scotland. One reason for that is that most Scottish cattle are reared specifically for beef and are not simply a by-product of the dairy industry. The majority of BSE cases have been in dairy cattle in England. Lest it be thought that I am being narrowly nationalistic, I acknowledge that the English industry has taken stringent safety steps. UK beef as a whole is probably now the safest in Europe, although Scottish beef always was.

Before the BSE crisis, Scottish beef exports to the European Union were worth about £120 million per annum. Now they are worth almost zero. Only one abattoir in Scotland, located in Bridge of Allan, Stirlingshire, can process beef under the present date-based export scheme, and it has already said that it will not re-enter the European market until Europe reviews the costly and complicated structure of the scheme.

[Mr. Michael Weir]

Can the Minister tell us whether there is to be any review of the date-based scheme? Given that the incidence of BSE has always been, and continues to be, low in Scotland, what representations have the Government made to the European Union for Scotland to be granted low-incidence status, which would hopefully mean fewer regulations on the export of beef to Europe?

Before the ban, exports of quality Scottish beef were worth about £125 million per year. That trade disappeared overnight and is now, even with the lifting of the ban, worth only a fraction of that amount. Before the ban, about 110,000 tonnes of UK beef—10 per cent. of total consumption—went to France. That market has now gone.

The French ban remains in place despite the fact that, this April, the European Union Food and Veterinary Office visited French laboratories, rendering plants, feed mills and other institutions. It reported that potentially infected material from animal carcases was getting into animal feed, and the rules on handling specified risk materials banned from the human food chain were not fully implemented. That is from a country that bans the import of beef from this country—double standards par excellence.

Earlier this year, it was suggested that the French Government were maintaining the ban for political reasons in the run-up to the French elections, but there was still no evidence of movement once the elections were out of the way. The French Government are flouting European Union law in an act of blatant protectionism. Either European law applies to everyone, or it is of no use to anyone. The illegal ban has now lasted for more than three years and action is long overdue. Will the Minister tell us what action the Government are taking to deal with the apparent outright double standards of the French, who maintain the ban on Scottish beef for purely political reasons?

On 26 June, it was reported that France had been given a 15-day ultimatum by the European Commission to lift its ban on United Kingdom beef or face large daily fines. By my imperfect arithmetic, that period expires today. Has any action been taken by the French Government to lift the ban? Has there been any communication to the UK Government or the European Commission indicating their intention to lift the ban? If that has not happened, will the UK Government ensure that the EU takes action this time?

Secondly, I am concerned about the proposed French action against Scottish lamb. I know that this is also of extreme concern to my friends in Wales who, as the Minister may be aware, have an important lamb industry.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. Does he accept that the sheep meat sector is vital for both our countries, particularly my constituency, which largely consists of hill farms? The French ban is having a serious effect on that industry, especially given the pressure on farm incomes, which are substantially lower than they are in England.

Mr. Weir: Indeed, I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. As he will know, many parts of Scotland have what was a thriving sheep industry. Parts of Angus, Perthshire and the highlands have a great many sheep, and many are on hill farms that cannot diversify to overcome the problems imposed by bans, such as the one proposed by the French. It has been reported that France plans to introduce draconian new processing rules that would decimate lamb exports from Scotland and Wales. It is said that the French will demand the removal of spinal cord from the carcases of all lambs aged over six months, despite the fact that European scientific advisers say that there is no justification for that. Despite extensive research and a lot of money being ploughed into it, there is no evidence that BSE is present in sheep at all.

The Minister must be well aware that a French ban would be a disaster for an industry that my hon. Friend has already said is reeling under the impact of foot and mouth. I know that it affected Wales far more than it did Scotland. That is yet another example of the French Government attempting to act unilaterally, which simply cannot be tolerated. Europe either works for all, or it works for none. Such actions undermine those of us who believe in the European Union, and wish to see movement in Europe. However, unilateral action by one Government against our farming industry is simply unacceptable.

The Minister will also be aware that prior to 1999, total UK sheep meat exports to the rest of the EU were, according to figures from his Department, over 100,000 tonnes per annum, and worth some £200 million to the rural economy. Last year, that figure fell to some 30,000 tonnes and the value to £77 million. Prior to that, France was a major buyer of Scottish lamb. However, it is not only the fact that France buys the lamb from Scotland and Wales, but that almost all lamb sold in other European countries moves through French ports. If the French Government implement the new rules, they will seriously jeopardise exports to France and to all other countries in the EU. The unilateral action of the French Government would affect exports not only to one country but to the whole EU. Again, that stands in the way of a free market in the EU.

I emphasise again that there is absolutely no evidence, despite a massive amount of research, that BSE is present in sheep. Scrapie is in sheep flocks in the UK, but it has been there for centuries without any ill effects. In Scotland, the Executive's forward strategy for agriculture seeks to eliminate the disease throughout the country. Steps are being taken to eliminate scrapie although there is no evidence that it can turn into BSE.

The proposals from the French Government are nothing more than another attempt to protect their sheep industry. A ban would be a disaster for the rural economies of Scotland and Wales. In Scotland, almost half of all lamb produced is exported and in normal times 80 per cent. of it goes to France. After the foot and mouth crisis, Scottish sheep farmers cannot survive another crisis. Although Scotland was not affected to the same extent as England and Wales by foot and mouth, the indirect effects on Scottish agriculture have been just as great because of the overall image of meat in the United Kingdom.

What action has the Department taken to tackle the issue with the French Government? What action has the Minister taken with the European Union? Can he assure us that if the French impose a ban, immediate action will be taken to ensure that it does not turn into another never-ending fiasco like the beef ban?

Those matters are crucial to the rural economies of Scotland and Wales. The Minister will be aware that in Scotland the average income of a farmer is £6,000 per annum, and I would guess that the average income is not much better than that in Wales. Sheep farmers are often hill farmers. They are not rich; they are very hard-working and they have suffered setback after setback in recent years. There is little prospect of diversification on hill farms because the ground is often suitable only for sheep and they cannot diversify, as is possible on some lowland farms. If a ban is imposed, many hill farmers will go out of business and the rural economy and the environment of Scotland and Wales will be the real losers.

Much as I respect the Minister, I must say that the Government are running out of credit with Scottish farmers, especially after the comments made by the Foreign Secretary on the common agricultural policy on Monday and the frankly offensive comments made in Scottish questions yesterday by the Secretary of State for Scotland, who went out of her way to agree that Scotland's farmers suffer from welfare dependency. Nothing could be further from the truth.

We have our own Parliament in Scotland, but unfortunately it does not have direct representation in Europe on those matters, despite their greater importance to the Scottish economy than to the UK economy. Scotland needs the normal powers of a normal independent nation to push those matters in the European Union. Until we reach that happy day, we are forced to rely on the UK Government to deal with such matters on our behalf. Will the Minister make sure that senior members of the Scottish Executive are allowed to represent Scotland in Europe on the issue, which is vital to Scotland and Wales? A lamb ban from France would see the end of those industries and yet more damage to the fragile rural economies of Scotland and Wales.

1.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) on securing the debate and making a strong case for both livestock farmers in his constituency and the situation in general. He will forgive me if do not agree with his last comment about the constitutional arrangements between Scotland and the United Kingdom, which, as he knows, are endorsed by the vast majority in Scotland.

I acknowledge that beef and lamb exports are important to the Scottish rural economy, as they are in Wales and England too. Members of the devolved Administrations have been closely involved at all levels of decision making in agreeing a joint UK approach to promote our interests and deal with some of the problems. I shall come to that in a moment, but first I shall deal directly with some of the hon. Gentleman's arguments, before I forget them.

The hon. Gentleman asked about low-incidence status for BSE in Scotland and whether it could be applied for exports. We have considered it and discussed it with the Scottish Executive. The problem is that if Scotland had low-incidence status, cattle movements across the border into the rest of Great Britain would have to be restricted. That would cause problems for many Scottish farmers. There are some practical difficulties in such an approach, assuming that agreement could be obtained.

Mr. Weir: I understand the Minister's point, but do not understand why the situation would be different, for example, if France had low-incidence status but Spain did not. The same problems would also arise between the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland, where there is a lot of cross-border traffic in cattle. Why would the circumstances be different for Scotland and England?

Mr. Morley: There would be problems because there is much more movement of cattle across the border between England and Scotland. English cattle are moved to Scottish slaughterhouses and Scottish cattle are moved to English slaughterhouses. Scottish cattle are moved south for all sorts of reasons. The Department's view is that there is much more movement in the patterns of the livestock trade, which would cause difficulties for Scottish farmers.

The hon. Gentleman is right, however, that BSE incidence is falling in this country very much in line with the projections of our scientists. The measures that we have had in place for some time and at some expense are working—there are no two ways about it. In some European countries, the incidence is rising. Therefore, we are making good progress and are on track to eliminate BSE.

It is fair to say that the overall number of cases has been higher in the UK than in other countries. Nevertheless, it is clear that our measures are working. As the number of incidents continues to decline, we will review the over-30-months scheme and the date-based export scheme. That is inevitable, and we will do it when the opportunity arises.

The hon. Gentleman asked what contact we have had with the French authorities about the reasoned opinion that the Commission has sent to the French Government on their non-compliance with the European Court ruling. As he stated, the opinion gives the French Government 14 days to respond as to why they have not complied with the ruling, but the court penalty is not automatically triggered after that period. Their response will be taken into account and, if the court feels that the response is inadequate, it has powers to take further action, which may include imposing daily fines on the French Government.

With our colleagues in the Scottish Executive and the devolved Administrations, we have been pressing very hard on the matter. We have lobbied actively and the subject has been raised at the highest level between the Prime Minister and Jacques Chirac as recently as 19 June. We have used all diplomatic channels open to us. The French equivalent of our Food Standards Agency contacted the FSA to ask about the measures that we have in place and their effectiveness. We know that the FSA is content with the measures and endorses what we have been doing about BSE. I hope that careful note is taken of that by the FSA's French equivalent, which has been asked to review the case by the new

[Mr. Morley]

French Government. That is a helpful move and I very much hope that the French Government will be persuaded that there is no justification for the ban in terms of consumer safety, let alone ignoring the law.

Mr. Weir: I am very interested in the Minister's comments. The French seem to be experts at obfuscation on the matter, which has been going on for years. The European Court gave them a 14 or 15-day period. Does the Minister know whether they have replied to the European Court or will things drag on even longer?

Mr. Morley: We certainly hope not. The dispute is between the European Commission and France. France is ignoring Community rules and it is the Commission's responsibility to ensure that those rules are applied. The court action has been brought and is being pursued by the Commission. We are actively reminding the Commission of its responsibilities and we expect an early resolution to the situation.

Court cases never move as fast as one would like. That applies not only to the European Court, but to courts in our country. Nevertheless, they get there in the end. I am confident that that will happen in this case. I hope that the French Government will think again before they are forced to go to court to lift their illegal ban. They have said to us that they are required by their national law to seek the views of their food standards agency—we know that they are doing that because their agency has been in touch with ours.

To lift the ban alone will not ensure that beef exports flourish. I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument that changes need to be made to the date-based export scheme. We are considering those and how they might apply. Our efforts are having some effect. We hope that amendments to the scheme will be adopted in Brussels shortly because they would encourage renewed participation and permit British beef to begin to regain its rightful place in world markets. Beef from all regions has a strong identity and Scottish beef has a very good record in exports. We and the Scottish Executive are giving thought to providing practical assistance with charges to new entrants on the date-based export scheme.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly stated, the French authorities proposed a six-month age limit on spinal removal. We never felt that that was justified and I am glad to say that they have recently agreed to postpone that proposal, which would have been illegal—yet again—under Community law. I recognise that the trade is worth £15 million per month to UK industry, and that it is important to many people in the UK, from those in the Pennines to the Welsh and Scottish hill farmers. We have worked closely with our colleagues in the devolved Administrations, with the EU and with other member states in pressing France to reconsider their proposals.

Had the French gone ahead with their proposals, the banning of specified risk material in the spinal cord of all sheep over six months old could have undermined the harmonised EU rules that apply to sheep from 12 months old. In practice, that would have required UK exporters to split lamb carcases to remove their spinal cords, certifying that lambs less than six months old pose considerable problems. Any live sheep export would have had to be certified beyond the EU standard. We are pleased with the thriving carcase exports to France and the rest of the continent and we hope that farmers concentrate on the carcase, rather than the live, element of exports.

In the opinion of the EU Scientific Steering Committee and the Food Standards Agency, the French proposals provided no significant consumer benefits. That is worth stressing. All countries have concerns about their consumers and want to ensure consumer protection; we are no different, which is reflected in our range of measures and how seriously we take them. However, it does not make sense to impose measures that are totally disproportionate and offer so few benefits for consumer protection. We have made that point strongly, and said that the French proposals, and the way in which that country is acting unilaterally, are illegal under EU law. We are glad that France is thinking again about the matter and has postponed its measures. We will continue to press the fact that their approach is both illegal and unnecessary.

On consumer protection, the Food Standards Agency has been considering such matters as whether banning sheep intestines would be an appropriate consumer protection measure. It has asked the Commission to consider adding intestines to the EU specified risk material list, arguing for that measure in Europe and testing the science, rather than imposing it unilaterally. We think that that is a much more sensible way forward on such matters.

The hon. Gentleman is right about the importance of our export markets for beef and, in particular, lamb at the present time. We on the UK side are working very hard, in conjunction with the devolved Administrations, to tackle those issues. It will take time to get our markets back. Once one comes out of a market, it takes time to re-establish oneself in it. It appears however, that the market for lamb has come back much faster than many people feared following the foot and mouth restrictions.

Mr. Weir: The beef market has been completely destroyed because of BSE. Does the Minister accept that a ban on lamb by the French, whether justified or not, has the potential to create the same devastation in the sheep meat industry? It is essential that the Government act, with the European Union, to stop the ban being imposed in the first place. Once a ban is there, the word will get around and the industry will take years to recover, if it can ever do so.

Mr. Morley: I absolutely accept that point, although it is an issue not only for us, but for other countries that sell to France and for French sheep traders themselves. The French sheep sector was very opposed to the French proposals for precisely the reason that the hon. Gentleman gave and for the reasons that I have emphasised. Such a ban would be difficult to enforce—ageing lambs less than six months old—it would not really improve consumer protection and it is disproportionate and illegal in Community law. We are glad that the French have withdrawn the proposals and we will press very strongly, through the EU and directly with the French, for them to be dropped completely. They should not simply be postponed; the French should recognise that they are not in their interests.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the image of meat. We have made considerable strides in this country towards restoring consumer confidence. It was a shock to many European countries, which had said that there was no possibility that their national herds would have BSE, to find out that they did have it. In some cases, they did not have the same measures for consumer protection, monitoring and enforcement that we now have in place, although such measures are now being stepped up on an EU-wide basis, to deal with that problem.

Consumers here and in potential markets can have confidence in the measures that we have put in place in this country. They are based on the precautionary principle, sound science and good and effective enforcement. There has been a considerable cost to this country in putting those measures in place, but that investment is well worth it, given the increased consumer confidence and safety.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned scrapie in sheep. He will be aware that we have launched the national scrapie plan, which is designed to eradicate scrapie completely from our national flock. That is beneficial to the quality of the flock and in trade terms. It will also remove any lingering doubts that scrapie is masking BSE in sheep. The hon. Gentleman is right that we have no evidence that there is BSE in our national flock. It is not as if we were waiting for something nasty to hit us; we are actively monitoring the flock and seeking the signs of BSE, and have not found any evidence of it at all. That is also important for consumer protection.

I again congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the case that he has made. I hope that I have convinced him that we are working in partnership with the devolved authorities to tackle the issues that he raised. I believe that we are making effective progress on that and winning the argument through the sound, scientific and reasoned way in which we have put our case.

Counselling Young People

1.29 pm

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): I thank the participants in the previous debate for giving me one extra minute to speak.

My reasons for initiating the debate are: first, to welcome the Government's recognition that children and young people have a legitimate right to be consulted on policy and public services; secondly, to highlight the position of children and young people in relation to citizenship; and thirdly, to ensure that the Government systematically review their methods of consulting children and young people so that all Departments improve and refine their consultation methods.

I strongly welcome the commitment from the Government, which has been led by the children and young persons unit, to involve young people in the design, provision and evaluation of policies and services that affect them. Young people are clearly users of public services and should be consulted as service users just as adults are. It has become accepted good practice in local government and central Government that public services should not be designed top down by service providers, but should try to respond to the actual needs, as opposed to the perceived needs, of the users. Consulting users is not just a public relations exercise; it actively contributes to the improvement of services, allows the expertise of service users to be incorporated into the design of services, and helps to identify which services should be prioritised.

An interesting example of that happening arose from an experience in my constituency. Milton Keynes council recently ran for children of primary and secondary school age a consultation day about the provision of local services. I was extremely surprised by the issue that those children, who were aged 7 and upwards, identified as their highest priority for extra spending. They wanted more police and more money spent on the police. They perceived that major problems were the bullying of younger children by older children, not just in schools where it can be dealt with but on the streets out of school hours, and harassment by adults—I do not think that they were referring to serious forms of abuse, but to adults who might speak to them in a way that they did not think was entirely appropriate. They also mentioned the problem of theft from children and focused, not exclusively, on mobile phones. They felt that they would feel safer if more police were about to whom they could appeal to protect them from those problems.

Children are clearly service users, but in a democracy children and young people are not just service users or consumers, they are citizens. I am pleased that from September, citizenship will be compulsory in British schools. Perhaps I should declare an interest: my husband has devised and has been running a course at the university of Leicester for training teachers of citizenship. I am pleased to say that all his students have found jobs in state schools starting in September. Some people are therefore trained and ready to teach citizenship.

The citizenship curriculum encourages young people to develop the knowledge and skills to enable them to be active participants in a democratic society. It also encourages schools to be more democratic environments; it is important that young people are not just taught democracy as if it were a theoretical skill, but that they feel part of democratic institutions. Despite the apparent lack of interest from young people in conventional political activity, which we politicians are constantly bemoaning, a huge amount of data shows that young people are interested and often passionate about politics in its widest sense, and particularly in environmental issues. They are just not terribly interested in politics as it is put before them by politicians in the political process.

From their interest in environmental issues, young people are often clear about the fact that personal behaviour can link into policy commitment and that personal decisions about consuming less or recycling more are a demonstration of commitment to more environmentally friendly policies that speak more loudly than writing letters or nobbling politicians. Young people understand that political change can be influenced by personal action, and that it does not just start or end with voting.

That brings me to young people and voting, as voting is a key right in a democracy. Many argue that the fact that the 18-to-20-year-old age group has the vote but does not use it at the same rate as older adults is a strong argument for not reducing the voting age to 16. I think that that is wrong and reject the argument absolutely. The absence of voting rights for 16-year-olds contributes to lower participation rates among young people who have the vote.

As the under-18s cannot vote, none of the political parties have programmes that address the needs of young people. I hope that hon. Members agree. I went around knocking on doors before the last general election and when I spoke to young people I was struck that there was not much that I could say about our programme—or what they should be opposing in the programmes of other parties—that was relevant to them. We were all addressing older people in our political programmes.

It is not surprising that not many young people voted because for young people there was not much difference between the parties. We had nothing to say that was very relevant to them. If 16-year-olds had the vote, we politicians would have to develop policies that addressed their needs. That would give younger people a stronger reason to vote.

I have become interested in affordable travel for young people. Transport is an example of how young people's needs are undervalued because they are essentially disfranchised. Affordable travel is a key issue for pensioners and young people. There are great similarities between those two groups. A large proportion of both groups are heavy users of public transport. Many in both groups have relatively little access to the private car, and they both have low incomes. Everyone knows that free bus passes for pensioners is a huge political issue, because pensioners have the vote and a high participation rate, so we try to court them and respond to their needs. At the other end of the scale, affordable transport for young people is not on the political agenda because young people do not have the vote, so the political parties do not address the issue. I am pleased that reducing the voting age is now on the agenda and I shall be supporting it.

Let us consider how the Government consult with children and young people. The Government's core principles were published in November 2001, but I tabled a series of written questions in April this year asking Departments when and with whom they had consulted in trying to gauge young people's interests. The answers showed a variable performance between Departments. Most said that they were drawing up an action plan to describe how they would consult with young people, but had not actually consulted with them. Whose responsibility is it to check that all Departments have finalised their action plans and are delivering them?

There were some examples of good practice. I shall cite the Department of Health, but there was good practice elsewhere, too. The Department of Health's "Quality Protects" programme, which relates to social services, has a young person's reference group that meets three times a year and can comment on and feed into the programme. The organisation A National Voice gives young people who are, or were, in care a voice in policy development in relation to children in care. Interestingly, the paediatric cardiac review involved child cardiac patients as well as medical personnel or the parents and carers of patients. They are good examples of good practice. Are the Government ensuring that all Departments follow those examples of actively consulting young people, so that good practice can be spread throughout the Government?

I draw attention to other models of consultation outside the Government. The science museum recently hosted a student review of the science curriculum, which was funded by Science Year. It started with nine regional conferences to identify issues in the science curriculum. A national group developed that into a web questionnaire. More than 350 students aged between 16 and 19 helped in the design of the questionnaire and more than 2,000 students responded to it. Those responses were so useful and mature that the Select Committee on Science and Technology decided to take evidence from students who organised and took part in the review to inform its report on science education. Are the Government encouraging Departments to contract out consultations when appropriate to outside organisations?

The second example to which I want to draw attention is less successful. Earlier this year, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, as it then was, launched a consultation document on the driving licence and driving test, entitled "A More Structured Approach to Learning to Drive". Because that was clearly a subject of interest to young people, I sent copies of the document to each secondary school in my constituency and to the Milton Keynes college and encouraged students to respond directly to the consultation.

Milton Keynes college thought that the document was so opaque that its students would not be able to respond to it. It redesigned it and wrote a shorter, snappier version. That was handed out to students, who then discussed it and responded directly to the consultation. When Departments write public consultation documents, will they do so in a format that is more user-friendly, particularly when the subjects are ones in which young people may be expected to have an interest?

Finally, I refer to consultation by bodies other than those in central Government, but on which the Government could give guidance. I thank the Howard League for Penal Reform, which drew my attention to its worries about the lack of consultation with children by local authorities during the formulation of local crime prevention plans. It said that too often children are seen as the problem that crime prevention plans should deal with, rather than the needs of the children themselves being considered. That is especially true of young teenagers, who are often seen as a threat by others in the community. By involving young people in crime prevention plans, the Howard League considers that more cost-effective solutions may often be found. As an example, it said that it may be more sensible to provide a free skateboard area or free swimming for children and young people as a more effective way of reducing the perceived problem of youths wandering about aimlessly than installing expensive closed circuit television, which simply watches them hanging about.

As many people know, Milton Keynes is a young city. The key complaint that I receive from older constituents concerns threatening young persons hanging about. One useful solution that we have found is the provision of youth shelters on local recreation grounds and parks. They give young people a place in which they can sit and chat to each other under cover, but not next door to shops or people's houses where they cause annoyance.

I draw attention to the Howard League citizenship and crime programme of which I am sure the Minister is aware. It has worked with more than 10,000 children in more than 100 schools to consider young people and crime prevention. I hope that the findings are being fed into the Government's thinking. Will the Minister ensure that Government guidance on drawing up crime prevention programmes and other types of community and partnership plans include the need to involve children and young people?

I commend the Government for the work that they have begun in involving young people. That is only the beginning, however, and I urge them to review the consultation continuously, so that we can all learn how to do it better.

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr. John Denham): As the Minister responsible for children and young people, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) on securing this debate. I share her view on the importance of involving young people and I am personally pleased to see that the issue is increasingly being raised in the House. I acknowledge the work of the two all-party groups—on children and on youth affairs—whose members are doing a lot to raise the profile of the issue, finding ways of listening to and [illegible]ving children and young people and pushing the issu[illegible]rward.

I am sympathetic to those of our colleagues who would like more regular opportunities to debate youth issues and for the relevant Ministers to take part in them. That has been the subject of much discussion, but I welcome today's debate as one opportunity to discuss youth affairs.

I think that all hon. Members share the vision of children and young people having more opportunities to be involved in the design and development of policies and services that affect them, and to be able to evaluate them and show where they have been successful. We want that partly because young people should genuinely feel that they can influence the services that they receive and, as part of the broader citizenship work that we are doing, because we want young people to feel that they can contribute to and benefit from the life of their local communities.

I share with my hon. Friend the belief that the result of the effective participation of children and young people in the development of policies and services is the improvement of those policies and services. She rightly asked me to set out some of the procedures and structures that the Government are putting in place to encourage greater participation. A hearts-and-minds issue is involved—we must convince those in local as well as central Government that the services that they deliver will improve and the taxpayers money that they spend will be better spent if young people have been involved in helping to shape those services.

To convince those involved would help the Government to achieve our ambitions for children and young people. It would help us to prevent and tackle the social exclusion of a significant minority of children and young people. It would enable young people themselves to build the stronger and more cohesive communities that we know we need to build in the years to come.

I am also clear about our commitment under the United Nations convention on the rights of the child to seek the views of children and young people. This year has been historic—during the UN special session on children, young people were able to address the General Assembly of the UN for the first time. I was pleased to have been a co-leader of the United Kingdom delegation, which included two young delegates, one from Scotland and one from Northern Ireland, who were able to participate in bilateral meetings that I had with Ministers from other countries. I was pleased to be the only Minister who had a youth delegate in those meetings, despite some countries claiming tremendous records in the field. That was a small first for UK representation at the UN.

There is a similar commitment throughout Europe. The UK has been at the forefront of the development with our recent White Paper on youth policy. The participation of young people is a key theme of that work. In the coming year, I hope that we can work with our European partners to share best practice and learn from the successes and problems that we all face in securing the participation of young people.

On the Government's record, as my hon. Friend said, we announced in November that we had agreed to follow and implement an ambitious set of core principles that will guide the approach that individual Departments should take in engaging children and young people. Nine Departments have been in the lead in that work, developing action plans for how they can build capacity within their Departments to involve young people, identify priority areas for working with children and young people and find ways of building the principle of involvement into the way that they communicate the work and the policies of those Departments. We worked with several children's organisations to develop the principles and guidance, and they—and the young people that they involved in that work—have warmly welcomed the initiative.

We must be honest. Different Departments approached this work from very different starting points. Some of them had a lengthy history, at least in part of their activity, of involving young people; others had little history of that. Therefore, this represents a cultural challenge to some civil servants in Whitehall, and to some of my colleagues in Government.

We are determined to push this through and my hon. Friend asked how far we had got with it. The action plans from the nine Departments were published in May 2002, shortly after her series of parliamentary questions. That is not completed work; it sets out work in progress, but it shows that each of those Departments have begun, with support from the children and young people's unit, to tackle how they are going to take this forward.

The unit will report progress annually, which will give an opportunity to scrutinise our work. As I am the Minister with responsibility for children and young people, I will oversee the work of the unit. We also expect that young people will be involved in scrutinising our progress. However, I do not want to give the impression that I am in some way taking—or wishing to take—personal responsibility for ensuring that the whole of Government involve young people. This initiative has to become a part of the daily activity of individual Government Departments and Ministers. It would be a mistake to try to centralise all of this—to have, for example, a single unit that tries to carry out consultations on all of the work of each of the Government Departments.

Having recognised that Government Departments have uneven histories with regard to consulting young people, I now wish to point to some significant achievements that they have made in this area. My hon. Friend rightly referred to the work that is being done at the Department of Health. Also, in autumn 2001 we launched a consultation on an overarching children's strategy, which we hope will come to fruition later this year. It is intended to bring together all of the different policies that affect children and young people, so that it can give a single overall picture of what the policies of the Government, the voluntary sector and local authorities are trying to achieve.

Innovative types of consultation material were included in the project: some went out through primary schools, and some were distributed at cinemas, leisure centres and so forth. Therefore, we have gained good experience of which sorts of consultation material work—to refer to another of my hon. Friend's points. She will be interested to learn that one of the matters that came high on the agenda in that consultation was the importance of having safe routes to and from schools. It sounds as if that echoes one of the conclusions of the smaller survey that she conducted in Milton Keynes.

The Department for Education and Skills held consultation meetings with young people when it was working on the "Schools—achieving success" White Paper that was published in the autumn. It also designed a document, specifically for young people, on the new proposals for education plans for 14 to 19 year-olds, and it has had more responses from young people in that age group than from all other respondents put together. For those of us who believe in this, that is an encouraging step forward.

The Home Office has been actively involving young people in consultations. For example, they took part in the consultations that were held after the disturbances in the north of England last summer, which addressed the issues involved in developing cohesive communities. Work that has been done with young people from Oldham and other towns is now being turned into educational material, videos and so forth, and they will be used in further meetings, consultations and discussion events in several towns and cities throughout the country in the summer and into the autumn. That is another encouraging sign: a real social challenge is being tackled in a way that acknowledges that the role of young people is crucial by going out and positively involving them in the work.

I mentioned the role of the children and young people's unit in supporting me and my work. As a result, I have been able to benefit from the expertise of the unit's advisory forum—26 young people aged between 11 and 18 who are from all backgrounds and walks of life and who hold forthright views on where they want to see change. That forum helped us to build the consultation on the Government strategy document that I mentioned earlier.

We also have a particular relationship with the United Kingdom Youth Parliament, which the Government have agreed to support with further funds. It meets next week. I shall attend, as will hon. Members from several different political parties. I look forward to reading the manifesto that the Youth Parliament will produce as a result of its meeting.

My hon. Friend asked several specific questions. I hope that I have set out what we have done with regard to the action plans and how we are ensuring that Departments follow examples of consulting young people. She asked whether Departments are encouraged to contract out consultations to outside organisations, if that is appropriate. That is among the range of possibilities that we suggested that Departments build into their consultation. Obviously, consultation has often been carried out through children and young people's organisations and organisations that work with children and young people. We need to allow for flexibility because there will be times when contracting out is the right approach and times when more direct consultation is important. However, I appreciate the value of the process.

My hon. Friend asked whether Departments could be encouraged to write public consultation documents in a more user-friendly format. Most of us would probably say that that applies to all consultation documents, not only to those aimed at young people. The answer is yes. Through the work of the Department for Education and Skills, work on the children's strategy and work that I shall mention on young people and voting, we have started to develop expertise on which I hope we can build.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) asked about votes at 16, and the Minister mentioned taxpayers' money. Sixteen and 17-year-olds may be taxpayers, so will he square the circle of no taxation without representation?

Mr. Denham: Let me tell the hon. Gentleman our position. One of the projects in which I have been personally involved is the "Y vote, Y not?" campaign, which was based on consultations with about 70 young people. It reached the end of its first phase of work at a conference last week and examined reasons why young people have not engaged with politics, and changes to processes that might encourage greater future involvement. A clear message that is not always understood is that we are not considering an apathetic or disinterested generation of young people, which is the picture that some people have painted. The generation has strong views on all issues about which hon. Members spend their time talking.

Young people do not think that we are talking about the issues with which they are concerned. That might well be because we spend a lot of our time talking about, or at, but rarely with, young people. That is a key issue on which politicians, political parties and those in the media should work together. We should not blame one group for getting things wrong, but our discussion of issues should be projected in ways that are more relevant to young people. We should give young people the opportunity to join with the process and to see others involved in it.

The campaign raised the question of voting age. Sam Younger, the chairman of the Electoral Commission, announced last week that the commission would examine voting age and produce a report for Ministers to consider. That is a result of young people raising the issue through the "Y vote, Y not?" campaign and in other forums. We do not promise always to do what young people say any more than we always do what pensioners, trade unions or businesses say. However, young people have a right to have their views taken seriously and addressed and to receive a proper response to any issues that they raise.

My hon. Friend mentioned young people's involvement in drawing up crime prevention programmes, which is important. I am pleased to tell her that I saw an excellent guide to the involvement of young people in such programmes earlier this year, which had been drawn up by several crime prevention partners in the west midlands. I arranged for the document to be reprinted as national guidance and it has been issued to crime reduction partnerships throughout the country. That is a practical example of putting a principle into action, which I hope is followed throughout the country.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Two o'clock.

[SIR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

NHS (Private Sector)

[Relevant documents: The role of the private sector in the NHS—First Report from the Health Committee, Session 2001-02, HC308, and the Government's response thereto, CM 5567.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Heppell.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the Chairman of the Select Committee on Health, I should inform the Committee that there is a minor misprint on the order of business. The report should be numbered HC308, not HC318.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the Health Committee's report on the role of the private sector in the national health service. I begin my expressing my appreciation to the Government for providing us yesterday with a response to the report in advance of today's debate. I was heavily committed in Yorkshire yesterday and had a royal visit to my constituency this morning, so I have not had the opportunity to study the response in as much detail as I would normally do. I apologise for that.

The inquiry was announced in July 2001 and the Committee published its report on 15 May 2002. The background to the inquiry was "The NHS Plan", in which the Government spelt out their intention to place greater emphasis on the role of the independent sector. It stated:

> "The time has now come for the NHS to engage more constructively with the private sector, and at the same time make more of its expertise available to employers throughout the country."

The plan went on to explain that four essential tests would be applied to any proposed partnership with the private sector. They are: the interests of patients, consistency with local and national strategies for the health service, value for money, and consistency with public sector values, including the issue of equity.

Our inquiry sought to examine in detail the new relationship. We held eight evidence sessions with a wide range of witnesses, including NHS trusts, primary care trusts, unions, academics, private sector companies and providers of private health care. We also visited two of the first wave of completed private finance initiative hospitals, including the one in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew). We are grateful to them for arranging very interesting visits for the Committee. I want to express our thanks to all who helped with the inquiry, those who gave oral and written evidence and those who gave up their time to meet us. I also thank our advisers, who provided valuable technical expertise, and particularly our excellent, first-class Committee staff who, as usual, provided marvellous support.

It is important to say that this is the first inquiry undertaken by the Committee since it was radically reconstituted after the general election. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends and colleagues on the Committee for their work over a lengthy period and the good-humoured debates that enabled us to come to our conclusions. The result is an important and well balanced critique of the current and future direction of the national health service.

The report consists of four main areas. The first covers the concordat, consultants' contracts and treatment overseas of United Kingdom citizens. The second covers the private finance initiative. The third covers local improvement finance trusts, the mechanism the Government are using to improve the primary care estate. The fourth covers public private partnerships, and we examined particularly the provision of pathology services.

I want to highlight the main conclusions of the report and particularly those that I believe to be of greatest importance. My colleagues on the Committee may select specific areas which they want to develop.

The concordat set out the parameters for the involvement of the private sector in NHS health provision. Its opening statement is:

> "There should be no organisational or ideological barriers to the delivery of high quality healthcare free at the point of delivery to those who need it, when they need it".

That indicated a clear step change in the relationship and a fundamental shift in Government policy.

It is fair to say that my opposition to private medicine is well known. It is based on a belief that private medicine has consistently undermined the basic equity principle of the NHS since it began in 1948. Throughout the period of the concordat, I have expressed unease at the direction that the Government have chosen. That is an important point I should make at this stage. I have particular concerns about the relationship with the private sector.

Initially the concordat was going to focus on elective, critical and intermediate care with the aim of driving down winter pressures and waiting lists. The plan stressed that the concordat was not a short-term measure, but the beginning of a longer-term relationship. We examined the concordat to establish the extent of its use, the impact on waiting lists, its relationship with mainstream public provision and the long-term implications of its use. When the Secretary of State gave evidence to the Committee, he suggested that a shortage in capacity was the principal factor in deciding to use the private sector. We all understand the need to reduce waiting lists. I understand the argument for using spare capacity in the private sector in the short term to achieve that aim, even if I am personally unsympathetic to it.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman, and I have read the excellent report with considerable care. Does he think that it is strange that the Government have decided to use only elective care in the private sector in some respects? They have made no effort as far as I can establish to make any use of the approximately 50,000 complementary practitioners who work largely in the private sector. Does he agree that it is a bit strange that they have gobbled up all the private sector beds without considering the acupuncturists, the herbal therapists or the homeopaths, many of whom are regulated by statute? Would he care to comment on that?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman for his consistency and commitment to an issue in which he believes strongly. I am not so sure. There are obviously wider debates about the appropriateness of the sort of provision to which he refers. He makes a fair point: perhaps we do have too narrow a view of what is treatment in a wider context. I would accept that, and if my late, very good friend Audrey Wise were here, she would be passionately saying that we should spend more time considering the alternatives that the hon. Gentleman has suggested on many occasions.

To return to the issue of capacity, it is worth making the point that, although NHS bed occupancy is running at roughly 90 per cent., private sector occupancy levels are between 55 and 60 per cent. Obviously, direct comparisons between the capacity levels of the two sectors can be misleading. Our report notes that bed management is easier in the private sector due to an absence of emergency patients. Furthermore, we have to recognise that lower bed occupancy rates are integral to the running of private hospitals, so that they can offer the flexibility of operation times, which is the main incentive for going private. However, the most important difference is that acute hospitals in the private sector do not employ consultants.

Consultants buy theatre time from the hospitals, and the vast majority of those consultants also work for the NHS. Obviously, they cannot work in two places at once. Therefore, exploiting the excess capacity of private hospitals could have a detrimental effect on NHS capacity. The Medical Practitioners Union told us:

> "It would be absurd if the Concordat resulted in fewer NHS operations and more waiting lists cancellations because staff were at the local private hospital 'helping the NHS to cope'."

I asked the Secretary of State about a case I had come across where an elderly lady was waiting for many months for an elective operation and was referred under the concordat to a local private hospital. She then saw the same consultant at that private hospital that she had been waiting all those months to see in the NHS. That is inappropriate and illustrates the point that caused us concern on the Committee.

Although we saw no objection to using the private sector in the short term, our report concluded that in the long term, increased use of capacity in the private sector may cause a direct threat to NHS resources. Therefore, we have made a number of recommendations to clarify that activity. We would like to see the Government assess the impact of concordat activity on staff availability in the NHS. I regret the fact that, from my understanding of the response, at which I have briefly looked, the Government have rejected the idea of a separate assessment of the impact on staffing. We felt that that was a key area to be examined, and I should be interested to hear the Minister's comments on that point later.

We argue that the Government should develop sufficient acute capacity in the NHS for it not to be reliant on the private sector. The Government response points to the likely impact on capacity of the new consultant contract. Perhaps the Minister will expand that point, because the new consultant contract was being drawn up and agreed before we concluded our inquiry. The Secretary of State gave some evidence on that when he came to talk to us about the NHS plan, but the contract had not been seen as evidence to the Committee while the inquiry was under way.

We also suggested that the Government undertake a cost-benefit analysis of reclaiming private beds in NHS hospitals instead of buying in operations from private hospitals. I welcome the Government's agreement that trusts should look at that point.

On equity of access, when we studied the concordat we were disturbed to find that take-up rates across the country differed markedly between areas that had available private sector capacity and those that did not. For example, whereas the concordat has commissioned 3,294 operations in the south-east, it has commissioned only 444 in the north-west. My hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) was particularly concerned about the way in which his area was not benefiting from the concordat arrangements.

The basic tenet behind the NHS is that there should be equal access for those with equal need. The uneven distribution of concordat activity appears to undermine that tenet. We therefore recommended against earmarking further money specifically for concordat activity. I welcome the Government's response, which gives a commitment to try > "to reduce to a minimum . . . earmarking".

That is a positive response from our point of view.

We recommended that any additional money available should be used in the local circumstances for which it is best suited. In some cases, that could be the development of local NHS capacity. In that way, each trust or region could identify and tackle its most pressing needs in the way that it felt worked best for it. Such a recommendation is entirely consistent with the trend towards greater devolution of powers to trusts. It was put to me by consultants at Pinderfields hospital in my area that they would have made far better use of the concordat resources had they not been forced to use them in relation to the local private sector. They felt that there were other ways, better suited to their circumstances, for benefiting patients in my area.

We also looked at how the concordat was assessed for value for money. Even in areas where concordat money was seen to make a difference, we could not find out whether that money was, in fact, well spent. If public funds are to be used in the private sector, value for money needs to be demonstrated. Comparisons can be made with NHS reference costs, such as the cost to the NHS of an operation, but our evidence showed that those are subject to very wide variation, which undermines their use in judging value for money. We have, therefore, called on the Audit Commission urgently to review a representative sample of concordat activity to assess its value for money. We also recommended that the Department take immediate steps to improve the methodology underlying NHS reference costs so that they can eventually act as a meaningful benchmark. I would welcome it if the Minister could clarify the Government's position on that recommendation.

Our report considered the impact on waiting lists of NHS consultants who work part-time for the NHS and part-time in the private sector. According to the Department's figures, if those consultants worked exclusively for the NHS, that would yield an increase in capacity equivalent to 1,500 whole-time consultants. That would be a significant increase, but our report acknowledged the difficulties in enforcing a ban on consultants working in both sectors.

When the Secretary of State gave evidence to us on the delivery of the NHS plan, he explained, in answer to a question that I put, how the new consultant contract would yield 14 per cent. additional consultant time for NHS work. That represents progress, but still falls short of the original proposal that the contract should include a seven-year moratorium on private sector work, given that consultants will still be able to work for the private sector once they have completed their statutory working week for the NHS.

Under the concordat patients may now be treated in the private sector as NHS patients by NHS consultants. Consultants currently manage both their private and NHS waiting lists, and the way in which those lists are managed creates confusion and potential conflicts of interest. It is important to point out that in the last Parliament we looked at consultants' contracts and were given evidence of possible manipulation of waiting lists in the interests of the private practice of certain consultants.

In this inquiry we received evidence from one manager who said that there was resistance from consultants in her area to the use of the concordat for NHS patients because of the potential impact on their private practice. There is clearly concern about that area. We felt that structural reform was needed to ensure a greater degree of probity. As part of that reform we recommended that trust boards should publish the details of payments for NHS activity made to consultants working in the private sector. I regret the fact that the Government do not accept that because some members of the Committee have continuing concerns about potential conflicts of interest.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): Does the hon. Gentleman also accept that some members of the Committee welcome the Government's commitment?

Mr. Hinchliffe: That says something about the Government's commitment. I have strong feelings on the issue, having had cases referred to me in which there has been manipulation of waiting lists. The vast majority of consultants work very hard for the NHS and we ought to address the matter in a way which is open and above board. It is wrong for there to be suspicions against consultants where such suspicions are completely misplaced, which is why the Committee felt that it was better to have the matter in the open. I shall be interested in the Minister's response on why the Government did not feel able to go along with the recommendation.

The report highlights our concerns about the training of medical staff. The NHS funds doctors' training, but after a number of years those skills can be transferred to the private sector. The private sector, therefore, gains medical expertise without incurring training costs, which is unacceptable. The Department and the independent sector need to agree to share that burden. We, therefore, recommend that the Government consider imposing a levy on the independent sector towards the costs of training health professionals that includes first qualification. On reading the Government reply to our report I was surprised that they had not been persuaded on that point. Again, I should be interested in the Minister's explanation of that particular response.

On the issue of job plans for consultants, two years ago the Committee expressed its astonishment that every consultant did not have a job plan because that was Government policy. At the time they acknowledged that job planning was a "clear and compulsory activity" for consultants. We were, therefore, most unimpressed to find that the situation remains almost unchanged. I welcome the mandatory enforcement of job planning proposed under the new consultant contract, which is mentioned in their reply to our report.

We also touched on NHS treatment abroad. Although that may be a way to reduce pressure on waiting lists, our understanding is that it is likely to prove a fairly marginal activity. The report notes that initial patient reaction seemed to be encouraging and a recent British Medical Association survey found that patients were not against travelling further afield if that meant that they would be treated sooner. We gave that development a cautious welcome, but our report sought assurances from the Government that there were robust mechanisms to ensure that patient follow-up can take place successfully and that the Department was confident of its legal position in the event of adverse clinical incidents.

We spent a considerable amount of time thinking about the contentious issue of the private finance initiative. In its past two election manifestos the Labour party committed itself to continuing with PFI to pursue its health objectives. The result has been an unprecedented level of new hospital construction. At the time of our report, 64 major new hospitals had been approved and of those, eight are now complete and operational and a further 15 are under construction. However, we had to satisfy ourselves that PFI was the best route to take to deliver value for money and that it would not have an adverse effect on the local health economy. Central to the Government's use of PFI is whether it represents value for money. If it does, it will be used; if it does not, in theory, conventional funding will be provided, although a sizeable body of opinion disputed the availability of Treasury funds.

Value for money is assessed by comparing the costs of PFI and traditional funding. The only way to prove it with certainty is to build two identical hospitals, one with Treasury funding and one using PFI. As that is not possible, the PFI is tested against a hypothetical model, the public sector comparator. The model represents the full life cost of public provision of a hospital. An assessment is carried out of the value of the risks retained by the public sector in both cases. It became clear that demonstrating value for money is a particularly complex task. Our report notes that the transfer of risk is an art, not a science.

[Mr. Hinchliffe]

On the surface, it appears sensible to transfer all the risk to the private sector under such a deal. However, that is counter-productive, as the premium charged for such risks may be too high. Furthermore, the private sector may not be able to manage the risks. Therefore, the risks of the project must be allocated on the basis of who is better equipped to manage them, whether the public or the private sector partner.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey): At present, the system seems to allow PFI partners to cherry-pick which risks they will take. Will the hon. Gentleman comment on that?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I will deal with that point in a moment. There is a feeling that the whole process is skewed in the interests of the private, not the public, sector. We felt that the risks should be allocated on the basis of who is better equipped to manage them. It is essential that optimal risk transfers take place with the private sector taking only the risks that it is equipped to manage. For that to happen, much greater transparency is needed.

The accountancy rules for PFI, which are imposed by the Treasury, use a net discount rate of 6 per cent. We received evidence that that figure gives an average value for money margin of only 1.7 per cent. in favour of PFI. Revising the figure downwards by 0.5 or 1 per cent. would tilt value for money in favour of traditionally procured projects. A Treasury official told us that although the Treasury was reviewing its accountancy rules and that the net discount rate might possibly be reduced, the balance between the two would not necessarily change. We felt it necessary to take a more cautious position. If the discount rate were revised downwards while still producing value for money in favour of PFI, we would want the National Audit Office to assess the process to ensure that the complex calculations were not being manipulated to the benefit of the PFI route. There seems to be a danger that a calculation that does not produce the right result is changed, rather than the policy.

It was interesting that the one thing that united all our witnesses during a fierce debate on the pros and cons of PFI was the need to address the Public Sector Comparator. The majority view was that its artificial nature undermined its credibility. We concluded that while comparing a PFI project using a PSC may prove that the PFI is value for money against an artificial comparison, it did not necessarily prove that it was value for money in absolute terms. Therefore, we recommended that the Department should refine the way in which the PSC was constructed. We also recommended that the National Audit Office should assess the PSC as a means to identify value for money and report swiftly to the Health Committee and the Public Accounts Committee.

After we published our report, Jeremy Coleman, the deputy comptroller of the National Audit Office, in an interview in the Financial Times questioned the PSC in its current form far more strongly than the Committee did in its report. He argued that some PSCs are "pseudo-scientific mumbo-jumbo" while others were "complete rubbish." In the light of Mr. Coleman's words, I believe that our recommendations are more pressing and that any NAO report on the PSC would make for interesting reading.

Much of the evidence that we received about PFI included complaints about the lack of access to information on projects and the lack of transparency during their development. One depressing element was the references to the lack of transparency in the whole process. PFI documentation is lengthy and impenetrable, which does little to inspire confidence in the process. The report cites two examples of that: the north Durham full business case occupies 145 pages and boasts accompanying documentation three and half inches thick; the full business case for Coventry Walsgrave hospital runs to some 17,000 pages. That is obviously an obstacle to objective scrutiny, particularly when many of those who want to scrutinise the documents may not be familiar with their format.

We acknowledge that there is an inherent tension between commercial confidentiality and openness, but in our view greater transparency is vital to publicly procured projects. We have, therefore, made a series of recommendations that should improve openness, one of which was that all PFI proposals should be required to include a financial summary in a stand-up format for all stages of the process and that PFI documentation should be made more accessible. The balance should be tilted in favour of openness. I welcome the fact that the Government have accepted the need for succinct executive summaries, but I am concerned about the lack of an explicit reference to the financial side. Will the Minister refer to that?

One of the main issues associated with PFI relates to the treatment of public sector workers directly affected by a PFI project. As part of such a project, members of ancillary staff are transferred from the public sector to the private company; they retain their NHS employment rights, but they cease to be public sector employees. Obviously, many employees are unhappy about that.

There are also concerns that staff transfers result in the creation of a multi-tier work force operating under varying pay and conditions. When I was in Carlisle, I was particularly interested in the comments of a ward sister who said that she is regularly sent on expensive team-building courses by her trust, but she has no team to lead because the key elements of the team have been split. The fact that her team had been broken up had a bearing on the ward sister's ability to do her job and manage her ward. One method of solving such a problem is to use the Department's retention of employment model, by which workers are managed by the private sector but remain in the public sector. That could be a way forward, so it is unfortunate that several witnesses said that pilot schemes for that model had stalled. I should be grateful to receive the Minister's assurance that pilot schemes are progressing and that their results will be published shortly.

We were impressed by the patient focus care model that we saw in Durham. It was a model of staff transfer that brought together NHS staff and contract staff on the wards under the management and leadership of the ward sister, who had the authority to organise all the contract staff as if they were NHS staff. Along with the retention of employment model, that offers obvious potential for an integrated work force.

As I said earlier, we considered the longer-term implications of PFI deals. PFI will tie the NHS and trusts into long-term collaboration with the private sector, and the lengths of the contracts will normally run for around 30 years in the first instance. Several of our witnesses questioned the ramifications of locking trusts into lengthy contracts, considering the speed of advances in health provision. Although the implications of PFI on the health economy cannot yet be assessed, we sounded a note of caution. We concluded that PFI had the potential to inhibit long-term flexibility in the light of new technologies and changing patterns of care and that the Government needed to ensure that PFI contracts were sufficiently flexible to respond to changes in demand without major penalties to the NHS. As there is no evidence that analysis has taken place, we have asked the Department to assess the future structure of and requirements for health assets and to ensure that all future contracts—whether PFI or conventionally funded—are examined in that light. I am not sure that that has been fully understood from looking at the Government's response. The Committee's concern related to the pace of change in health and the impact on any form of future capital provision.

Mr. Tredinnick: Did the Committee have a chance to examine the issue of ward cleanliness in relation to PFI? There is obviously a serious problem of infection in wards because of the way in which they are cleaned at the moment.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I am well aware of that and have certainly seen some hospitals in which the PFI project was not a factor. However, the contracting out of services has had a major impact on standards. My hon. Friends may wish to comment on it, but I had no problem with cleanliness in the two hospitals that we visited.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North): My hon. Friend might be interested to know that my local hospital, the Luton and Dunstable NHS trust hospital, has brought cleaning services back in-house. It could not get the hospital cleaned privately.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I am interested to hear that; it has happened in other hospitals.

I have spoken for nearly half an hour, so I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion to allow others to speak. The Committee devoted a small part of its report to PFI and the surrounding debate. We noted that even a cursory examination of the evidence showed that the debate had become polarised and that the climate was not always conducive to rational analysis. We all know that PFI is an emotive issue, which makes it even more important that we have a rational and objective debate. We concluded that the onus was on the Department to take the lead. If benefits are likely to arise from PFI, they must be clearly explained; and if not, that too must be acknowledged.

It is sad that the Committee should have became a victim of that polarised debate when five paragraphs out of 155 became the main items of interest in the national press. It is clear from the report that I moved the deletion of paragraphs 65 to 69. I did so for specific reasons. First, as Chairman, I do not have a vote unless a vote is tied, and I could not otherwise indicate my views on those paragraphs. Secondly, I profoundly disagreed with their content. The evidence of Professor Pollock in particular has been dissected and examined in the sort of detail that I have never seen happen with any other academic witness.

I am particularly concerned that those paragraphs are factually inaccurate, as well as being grossly unfair to the professor and her union. I would add that the origin of those paragraphs has been subject to considerable press speculation. Indeed, many journalists have suggested that they were tabled on behalf of the Government. I place it on the record that I strongly refute such suggestions. Although I disagree with the Member responsible, in every other way I have the greatest respect for someone who is a hard-working member of the Committee and who would not act in the way suggested.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): My hon. Friend says that we have looked in more detail at that than at other evidence. Does he not agree that when we see things that seem wrong we should consider them in detail, and that if we see things that we believe cannot be justified, we should say so? He says that those paragraphs are inaccurate. Will he say what is inaccurate?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I went through those paragraphs in detail in Committee and I specifically addressed each of the paragraphs to which the amendments did not reflect an appropriate evaluation of the evidence. I do not believe that those paragraphs stand up to objective examination. I do not profess to be objective, because I feel strongly that the witness put forward credible evidence. I stand by what I said a moment ago—I have never seen an academic's evidence examined and dissected in such detail as was Professor Pollock's. My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) and I agree on many things, but we differ on that subject. I could go into great detail on those paragraphs, but I have already spoken for half an hour and others may wish to speak.

Mr. Burns: The hon. Gentleman said that there had been press speculation that those paragraphs had been supplied by the Government. He said, "I refute that." I should be interested to hear what evidence he has to refute it. Has he spoken to Ministers? Has he spoken to the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown)? Has he investigated other ways of refuting it?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I have made it clear that it was put to me by numerous journalists that the paragraphs were moved on behalf of the Government. My response to each of those journalists was to say that I know the Committee member responsible well and I do not believe that she would take such a course of action. She feels strongly about the issue, as do I, but I have no doubt that she would not take such a step. I have a great deal of respect for her and her work as a member of the Committee.

Andy Burnham (Leigh): My hon. Friend referred to the fevered nature of the debate around PFI. Does he accept that some of the work of the unit that we are referring to has contributed to that debate? When we went to Carlisle, local people did not share the outrage that we had been led to believe they felt about the development of their new hospital. Was it not important to bring that out in the report?

Mr. Hinchliffe: Yes. It is a matter of record that my views of PFI have been affected by the process of the inquiry. I was impressed by the two buildings that we saw constructed through the PFI scheme. However, questions need to be asked about the PFI route—in particular about the impact on longer-term revenue costs in a given area, and on the wider health economy, especially if a scheme is to lock a local health economy in to a particular form of provision that will last for a long time, when that form of provision might well become grossly outdated. Those are the areas that should concern us.

In the whole debate, only one unit seems to be questioning the merits of PFI. That is an important role for it to play. In a democracy there should be people who question the direction that the Government are taking. It is wrong when people attempt to discredit the academics concerned—I am talking, not about my hon. Friend, but about others.

Ms Drown rose—

Mr. Hinchliffe: I have spoken for well over half an hour. My hon. Friends will have a chance to express their opinions. I shall refer to some other points in the report, then my colleagues can make their contributions.

I have not yet mentioned the LIFT—local improvement finance trust—schemes that we looked at. We accept that the current stock of GP premises needs to be reviewed. In certain areas it is in disrepair. Our witnesses from the NHS Alliance described the investment by GPs as "poor" and the BMA said that investment was "sorely needed". The Secretary of State has acknowledged that primary care in many parts of the country, particularly the poorest parts, is appalling.

To address those problems, the Government are introducing LIFT schemes. They are a form of public-private partnership in which investment, along with Department of Health money, will be used to build and maintain primary care facilities. The Department expects to attract up to £1 billion of investment by using LIFT schemes. They will be targeted at a substantial refurbishment or replacement of the premises of up to 3,000 family doctors by 2004 and the creation of some 500 one-stop primary care centres. The intention is that LIFT schemes will be targeted at the areas of greatest need, and the first six schemes reflect that aim.

While our report welcomed the aim of LIFT schemes, they remain untested. None of the first six schemes has been completed. For that reason, we took a cautious position. We should have preferred to see those six schemes assessed for value for money and service provision before LIFT was rolled out nationally, and we recommended that the Government undertake a rapid assessment of the first schemes. In the light of the many structural changes taking place across the health service, we recommended that LIFT schemes be considered in the context of integrated strategic planning of health care assets.

I apologise for the length of my contribution. I have tried to give a brief summary, albeit a subjective one, of a lengthy and complex report. Colleagues can put their own spin—[Interruption.]—or views when they are called.

To conclude, our report urges some caution and a proper evaluation of the relationship with the private sector and its impact on the NHS. Once again, I thank my colleagues for their support during our work. I hope that our report leads to steps forward on the issues about which we have expressed concern.

3.9 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): This is an extraordinary debate. No one could have imagined a debate about the role of the private sector in our national health service taking place after May 1997. The right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was Secretary of State at that time, and hon. Members well know that his views on the role of the private sector were somewhat different from those of the present occupant of that high office.

The Health Committee has 11 Members and we are quite different personalities. Indeed, in certain respects, we are an unholy alliance. We bring to our horseshoe table different areas of expertise and different opinions on health care. I pay tribute to our Chairman, who has never shied away from the fact that he hates the private sector. Indeed, he absolutely loathes and despises every aspect of private health care in this country. It is a brave hon. Gentleman who holds such views and then chairs a Committee that produces a report such as ours, to which I am proud to sign up. We cannot reveal the details of the discussions that took place as we concluded our report, but we had some interesting deliberations and you, Mr. Olner, will have enjoyed hearing parts of them during the contributions of the hon. Members for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and for South Swindon (Ms Drown). That will have given you a flavour of our different opinions on the issues.

I genuinely believe that the Government do not have a well worked-up health policy and that they react to crisis—I call it crisis management. I am sure that the Minister will condemn the remarks that I am about to make, but our report—however one reads it—says thank goodness we have received support from the private sector. That is in stark contradiction to the way in which Labour Ministers used to speak. There have been several crises in the past five years. The crisis over waiting lists and, dare I say it, waiting times had a huge impact on our constituents. We all recall the Prime Minister going across to St. Thomas's hospital to make several announcements on health care at a press conference.

Our report recognises the fact that the Labour party has undergone a huge shift on private health care. Labour Members and Labour activists say that the Conservative party totally opposes the national health service and that it would privatise it if it were in government again. I will not waste time talking about the language that Labour Members use on the subject; I think that the Government are privatising our national health service by stealth. There is no time in our short debate for me to expand on that. I will do so at another point.

At one time, this Government sent people abroad for operations. If a Conservative Government had done such a thing, there would have been an outcry from those influenced by the Labour party, yet nothing has been said about it. I am proud to be a signatory to the wonderful report on the role of the private sector in the NHS.

Ms Drown: May I give the hon. Gentleman a little insight into the matter? The British public might trust the Labour Government with the NHS and believe that Labour is trying to make an NHS of which everyone can be proud and on which everyone can rely. However, they might not trust the Conservatives, whose action on the NHS served to undermine some of its principles. One probably would give one's credit card to one's best friend to look after, but one would not go up to a stranger in the street and ask them to look after it.

Mr. Amess: When I end my contribution, I shall remark on the trust of the British people in the Labour party on the health service. All that trust has gone.

I am delighted to serve on a Select Committee. Parliament has undoubtedly been ignored on many issues, but the work of our Select Committees is to be cherished and acknowledged by Her Majesty's Government. Recently, the Committee had an away day and there was some debate among its members as to how we judged the success of our work. We are all busy people and it is nonsense to think that we traipse along every Wednesday or Thursday, listen to hearings, hold private sittings, publish reports and that that is the end of the matter. The work of the House is at its best when we produce reports.

We do not expect the Government to sign up to every aspect of the report. I realise that the summer recess starts on 24 July and we do not come back until October, but on this issue I hope that we will soon find out not necessarily what the Government have accepted, but how they have reacted to the report in detail. The Minister knows that our recommendations are on pages 45 to 50, and I want to touch on some of them quickly.

Our recommendation (a) is that > "the Department should commission an independent assessment of the impact of the purchasing by the NHS of activity from independent providers on staff availability within the NHS".

All members of the Committee, whether they are pro or anti the private sector, thought that that was sensible, but that fact is hopeless unless we find out whether the Government agree.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I am most reluctant to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but does he know that we published a response to the Committee's report?

Mr. Amess: I do.

Mr. Hutton: In it, we spell out the answer to the hon. Gentleman's questions.

Mr. Amess: Well, I am not entirely convinced that we saw the details. I hope that the Minister will allow me to expand a little further on the subject.

When a Minister gave us evidence—I think that it was a Secretary of State—I became exercised about the way in which we produce reports and are given a response by the Government. I am delighted that the Government's response is one of the quickest that we have ever had to any report. I congratulate the Government on listening to our criticisms on that point.

I am interested in what happens after the Government's response. If the Minister has time, will he tell us whether there will be debates on the matter on the Floor of the House? Now that the Government embrace the private sector, we need to know how we can monitor whether that policy is successful. That is why I draw the Minister's attention to recommendation (a).

Recommendation (b) states:

> "We recommend that the Department , together with trusts, should look at ways of providing further incentives to staff to work for the NHS".

I cannot see much detail on that point in the Government's response. Given that the trusts are bedding in and will do so much work in delivering better health care for the country, will the Minister tell us how Parliament might monitor the progress of the project in the four remaining years?

The recommendations go on to say that

> "now would be an appropriate time for the Department of Health to ensure trusts have undertaken a recent cost-benefit analysis of the reclaiming for the NHS of capacity utilized to provide private pay beds in NHS hospitals."

Again, although the Government have replied, the scene is one that changes quickly. Will the Minister tell us how the Government intend to give the Committee feedback?

What most exercised me was the matter of consultants' contracts. I think that we were all present when we received representations from consultants on the issue. The rhetoric and original position have changed extraordinarily. Organisations that are in a better position to judge the matter than is any hon. Member are using the words "climb down". We can all talk tough in the hope that the general public remember tough talk, but I remember not only the tough talk but the outcomes. If interest groups are saying that the original position has changed, I should like to know how the system works in practice, although the Minister may not have time to give those details in the debate.

Our recommendations make it clear that some hon. Members were concerned about the issue of consultants' contracts. We all understand that issue of consultants' contracts, and no one better than the hon. Member for Wakefield, who wants the best possible health service for people. However, we are dealing with human beings and all their failings. If an army of people is saying that because of the changes there will be a reluctance to enter the profession or to work in this country, who will do the work in future? The Committee was entirely right to reflect on the position of consultants.

I was present at most of our deliberations on the private finance initiative. Some members of the Committee clearly understood every aspect of PFI, but I am not convinced that every Member of Parliament has a complete command of those issues. I am not even convinced that all of those giving presentations had a complete command of the issues involved in PFI. The subject is delicate, difficult and challenging.

[Mr. Amess]

I am not being gutless, but I do not want to get involved in the differences between the hon. Members for Wakefield and for South Swindon. I was uncomfortable with some of the evidence, inasmuch as there did not seem to be the sort of balance that I would have hoped for.

I am always grateful for faxes and was pleased to receive a briefing from the Royal College of Nursing. I am privileged to be shadowing a nurse at Southend hospital tomorrow, as the nurses come on at the end of the night shift at 7 am. I shall probably be discussing the PFI initiative as we go round. The College has reflected on our deliberations and wants us to consider four points. It believes that there should be > "closer input into the design of PFI projects by trust staff . . . retention of employment models and patient-focused care . . . greater transparency in the PFI documents and simpler, more accessible documentation" and

> "valuation of 'risk', assessment of public sector comparator, more conventionally procured schemes."

All of that is worth reflecting on and the Minister and his brilliant officials will no doubt have time in future to do so. Finally, the college believes that which was one of the main recommendations of our report.

> "waiting times should be maintained on a basis that ensures equity of access to health care",

I do not know whether the Independent Healthcare Association wrote to all hon. Members, but it saw an opportunity in this debate. It is a wonderful organisation that understands the political and ideological differences on this matter. Its health cash plans are inexpensive forms of health insurance, paying out benefits for a wide variety of treatments and making grants to members for stays in hospital or on the birth of child. Most hon. Members have many constituents who belong to it. The organisation simply wants to say to Ministers that, as the debate continues, it hopes that the Government will bear in mind the valuable role that its member organisations play in caring for the nation's health.

I end, as people breathe a sigh of relief, with the issue that prompted the hon. Member for South Swindon to stand up. She tried, I suppose, to smooth the way by taking on the great challenge of explaining how the Labour party used to view private health care and its position now. We all welcome sinners, and those who repent are welcomed with open arms. The people who I represent are not bothered—they have no hang-up whatsoever—about who provides their health care. They resent the fact that they have to pay for it, and if they are told that they have to wait for two years to get treatment on the national health service. They say, "David—we have worked hard and we don't have much money, but we are now having to fork out and use our savings to have an operation brought to a conclusion sooner than it would be on the NHS." They are not bothered whether the Government use the private sector.

For goodness' sake, let us draw a line under the great divisions that there have been among the Conservatives, Labour and the Liberal Democrats—I cannot speak for the Independent party, but its leader is with us this afternoon. That would be wonderful. We could be united, because whether or not we want to use the private sector to help the NHS, all of us want the best possible health service for the people whom we represent.

If the Government act on some of the recommendations contained in the Select Committee report, it will undoubtedly result in a better health service for each and everyone of our constituents.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I advise hon. Members that although I see no sinners here, I want to give the Minister and the main speakers from the two Opposition parties at least 50 minutes to wind up—not 50 minutes each, but 50 minutes between them. I know that a number of Back Benchers wish to speak, so I ask them to be positive in their contributions.

3.30 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I am a bit jealous of not being a member of the Select Committee. It was obviously an interesting Committee, and I always enjoy debating with the Chairman, as he is one of the few Labour Members who makes me look like a Blairite.

I am here today because the first PFI hospital was built in my constituency, and I had the bouquets for that as well as bearing the scars. That hospital had been cancelled five times by the previous Conservative Administration because of lack of money. I remind the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) that the Tories did not get one PFI hospital off the drawing board; they were a total failure in that respect.

In 1997, I asked the then Secretary of State for Health whether we could have a new hospital, and I was told that we could, but that no public sector money was available and it would have to be a PFI project. If other hon. Members had been faced with that choice, what would they have done? I accepted the PFI. It was built on time and on budget, and it was opened by the Prime Minister in June 2000.

The new hospital was needed because staff were operating on a split site. The consultants were working on one side and the maternity unit on another, and it was said that babies were dying as a result; the temporary buildings that were used for elderly people were built during the first world war. We had major problems. That is the background; that was why we wanted a new hospital, and that is why it was one of the hospitals built in the first phase of PFI.

I thank the Committee for coming to Carlisle and seeing the hospital. I know that many hon. Members were impressed by it. I hope that their journey on the west coast main line was as good as the visit to the hospital—but I doubt it. The new hospital has 442 beds. It was originally designed for 474 beds, but the number was reduced. It was said that that happened because day surgery was becoming more common and because of an agreement between the consultants and the trust management, but I believe that it was the result of financial pressure. The report says that people thought that it was because of PFI, but I do not believe that. The same financial pressures that had caused the hospital to be cancelled five times before were the cause: there was not enough money in the system.

Many operations are still being cancelled. In the Cumberland infirmary, 47 operations were cancelled in January and 27 in June, but only eight were cancelled in March. The idea that winter pressure caused the cancellations is not correct. We had a very mild winter, and the figures on bed blocking show that whereas in December 2001 36 beds were blocked every week, in July 2002 only 14 beds are being blocked. Although we are making great progress, with social services and the health authority working together, in reducing the number of beds blocked by people who should be somewhere else, there are still many cancellations. In Carlisle the real problem is a shortage not of acute beds but of sub-acute and intermediate care beds.

I worry that we shall not be able to tackle that problem. The new PFI hospitals show that the Government have accepted the need for more beds; they have said, I think, that 5,000 more beds are needed throughout the country. Unfortunately, as happens with the first of anything, the scheme brings mistakes as well as progress. Work must be done to put that right.

The primary care trust and the North Cumbria NHS trust in my constituency seem to be in a state of denial. I had a meeting recently with them, which was very polite, at which they said, "We don't need any more beds. If we do get any more, we'll fill them up." I could not see the logic of that argument. I think that some of the people now involved in that subject in my area were the same people who decided that we needed only 442 beds in the first instance. I really worry because the bed model says that we will need 75 more beds in five years' time, and a statistician who was employed said that we will need 79 beds in five years' time. The consultants say that they have the staff and the operating capacity, but cannot do the operations.

One solution that the trust has come up with is to put a modular ward as a temporary measure at the back of what I remind hon. Members is a brand new hospital. It is suggesting, in fact, that we add a portakabin, containing between 12 and 15 beds, to the first PFI hospital built in this country, which is still new. That has nothing to do with a shortage of acute beds; it is about waiting lists and getting numbers down, after which the ward will be taken away. I do not believe that if the project goes ahead, that ward will ever be taken away. As I said at the start of my speech, the temporary wards that were built at the Cumberland infirmary during the first world war were not knocked down until 2000.

I would like the PCT and the trust to come to me, admit that they have a shortage of beds and insufficient finance and ask me to go to discuss the matter with Ministers. We have no cottage hospital in Carlisle, although a premises called Durranhill house has come up for discussion. The trust was at one time considering taking it on as a cottage hospital, but has now decided not to do so.

Another opportunity is provided by the extension built to the Cumberland infirmary in the 1970s, which we call the tower block. I understand that it has about 140 beds, operating theatres and intensive care facilities. The trust has applied for nearly £1 million to knock that building down—yet for £9 million we could renovate it. It could give us the sub-acute beds that we need and, in line with Government thinking, we could have a diagnostic and treatment centre, where routine operations could be carried out away from the problems associated with accident and emergency provision.

If someone had asked me whether I wanted that to be funded by PFI or traditionally, I would have said that I was not bothered. All I thought about was the fact that we needed that new unit. We have an excellent hospital, and I would not like to leave Members attending the debate today with the impression that we have a bad hospital. The new hospital is a credit to us, and the staff enjoy it. We give better quality care to our patients. However, it is the lack of beds that frustrates everyone. We will not get the full use out of that hospital, and the Government will not get the credit for it, until we tackle the shortage of beds in Carlisle.

With regard to PFI, I think that we are saying that the jury is out—and I am sure that the Chairman of the Select Committee would say that the jury is more than out. In the example in my area, PFI has worked with regard to the hospital, but we still have a chronic bed shortage that needs to be put right.

3.40 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest): May I first say how pleased I am to see the Minister in his place to respond to the debate, and also thank the Chairman of the Health Committee for welcoming me, as a complete tyro, to the functions of a Select Committee? Naturally, our Chairman has covered much of the ground, so I shall restrict myself to the part of the report that concentrates on the private finance initiative. I have to declare a paradoxical interest here, because were it not for the PFI, I do not think that I would have achieved this unique way of supplementing my pension—but although I am grateful to the PFI for that, I admit that I still oppose it.

First, I draw the Minister's attention to conclusion (q), which calls for a "rational and objective debate". I welcome the Government's reply, which rather to my surprise welcomes the call for this debate. That is rather in contrast to what the Secretary of State is quoted as saying in paragraph 96 of our report:

> "I think in the end we can have a huge load of arguments about the Private Finance Initiative and whether it is good, bad or indifferent, whether it is good value for money, bad value for money, and all these different things, but in the end its compelling attraction as far as the National Health Service is concerned is that we can get more hospitals built more quickly."

That to me rather implies blind acceptance of PFI as the only way of meeting a short-term political imperative, rather than a willingness to hold an open debate. I must refer briefly to beds because that issue is an absolute minefield, as I have discovered many times. The Government response agrees that there has been a lack or transparency about bed numbers. One of the difficulties is that there are so many definitions of bed numbers. I sometimes think that civil servants and health managers get confused about those definitions. Is a bed in a community hospital an acute bed or not? Is a bed in a five-day orthopaedic ward included in the list of general and acute beds? I welcome the national beds inquiry, and the Department of Health's promise to achieve transparency within the framework of that inquiry. I make a personal plea to the Minister: will he persuade the Department of Health to clarify bed definitions and have one set of definitions that it will always stick to?

Our Chairman drew attention to the risk transfer and the less than optimal ways of calculating that. He also drew attention to the public sector comparator. I would add another quote from the deputy comptroller of the National Audit Office. On top of what our Chairman told us, the deputy comptroller implied that the end result of negotiations and consideration of a PFI was always pretty clear:

> "If the answer comes out wrong you don't get your project. So the answer does not come out wrong very often."

Page 21 of the Government's response addresses our suggestion that there should be a realistic comparator, because the public sector comparator is sometimes unrealistic. We recommended that a comparison should sometimes be drawn with a do-nothing option, and I have to say that the writer of the response to that section confused the public sector comparator with the do-nothing option.

I should like the Minister to comment briefly on three paragraphs that were not highlighted. In paragraph 92, the Business Services Association representative asked us to recommend that the public sector comparator should become a real comparator. Another worry was expressed in paragraph 102:

> "Once a preferred bidder has been announced competition ceases and any increase in the tender price will not be subject to further competition."

Paragraph 110 refers to the fact that the annual charge is the first call on a trust's revenue before all other payments, which implies that cuts will have to be made elsewhere if a trust cannot meet those charges. I am not sure that the Government's response to conclusion (z) covers that point if all PFI facilities are not needed as the years go by.

I should like to turn as briefly as I can to the vexed paragraphs 65 to 69, to which the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) has already referred. Like him, I am not imputing motives to members of the Committee, because during the time that I have been a member of it I have learned to respect all the Committee's members. However, I feel that those paragraphs constitute an attack on the evidence of one academic unit. They are not borne out by other evidence, for which I know we have been asked, and I shall try to address that matter.

Paragraph 65 claims that University College London's Health Policy and Health Services Research unit has > "confused criticism of capital charges...with criticism of the PFI".

It is well known that the unit, in particular Professor Pollock, objects to both capital charges and the PFI. To my mind that is not confusion, because she objects to both policies. Many of us in the NHS in the early 1990s objected passionately to the imposition of capital charges, which took money from the patient care budget and only appeared to put the NHS on a level playing field with the private sector. Many people objected to capital charges at that stage. Professor Pollock clearly objects to both capital charges and PFI. Question 393 of the evidence asked whether the problem was capital charges or PFI, to which Professor Pollock replied:

> "I think there are two problems."

It could not be clearer that she thinks that there are two separate problems.

Ms Drown: Three questions later the Committee asked the unit whether it accepted the point that sometimes in the NHS it is good to spend more on capital and less on medical staff because the NHS gets a better service, which could be a reason for a PFI project being better value for money than an NHS scheme. The unit accepted that point provided that the money did not come from the revenue budget. How could one do anything other than that in the NHS? Is that not a confusion with capital charges?

If one looks at the piece of evidence that the unit sent in—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. May I advise the hon. Lady that she is on my list of speakers?

Ms Drown: Yes, Mr. Olner, I am quite happy with that. As this is a debate, I might as well make the point—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): No, it is not a debate. The hon. Lady is making an intervention.

Dr. Taylor: I am coming to those points, if I get the chance.

The first of three points arising from paragraph 66 is that

> "claims that there had been no checks against any of the value for money tests were untrue, since the National Audit Office had completed at least one such study."

I cannot find a reference to that in the transcript, and the parts that are presumably about the unit refer to checks of value for money after project completion rather than no checks at all.

My second point about paragraph 66 is the reference to

> "Professor Pollock's assertion that 'There is a new pact with big business which is not operating currently in favour of the population'", which she certainly made. She said that in answer to a loaded question, and in her answer to the person's question she said that in her opinion there was a huge new industry for accountants, lawyers and management consultants. I do not believe that someone should be condemned for one sentence taken out of context, or for holding an opinion that is contrary to one's own, especially if one is backed by parliamentary privilege. One may disagree but one may not condemn.

Mr. Hopkins: The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that when I recently spoke to a lawyer who worked on rail privatisation, she told me that the Government gave out millions of pounds and poured money for rail privatisation into a black hole. Accountants and lawyers made vast sums from it, and they will make vast sums from PFI.

Dr. Taylor: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that helpful comment.

The third point from paragraph 66 is that the > "claim that PFI involved writing an 'open-ended cheque . . .' was not backed up by the evidence".

In fact, evidence to back it up was provided in appendix 27. The Committee can say that the evidence was not sufficient, but it cannot say that there was none.

Ms Drown: Would not the cheque be more open-ended with a publicly financed scheme, as the public sector would have to pay for anything that goes wrong? A privately financed scheme limits the risk, because risk has been transferred. In that sense, the cheque is more closed in a privately financed scheme than in a publicly financed scheme. That is what the Committee found.

Dr. Taylor: We have already covered the art as opposed to the science of risk transfer, and I do not wish to return to it.

I do not understand how paragraph 67 can be based on questions 395 and 396. In my opinion, all that Professor Pollock said was that if new investment generates extra capital costs in a hospital's annual operating budget, it should be properly funded. MRI scanners were a red herring. I do not believe that the inquiry was given any evidence about staff savings from MRI scanners. In the past, many advances have been expected to result in savings, but many have failed.

Paragraph 68 is simply an assertion that there is a lack of sound analysis. That is an opinion of the Committee that is not based on evidence. The Committee has condemned the unit for an antagonistic attitude. Is disagreement always antagonism? Is one condemned for disagreeing with government policy? That is what has led to the accusations of political influence.

I wish to give some evidence from my personal experience rather than from the inquiry. The unit prepared a report, free of charge, on the Worcester private finance initiative, which was followed not with constructive debate but with denials of its accuracy and attempts to denigrate its authors' work. Spin and confusion over bed numbers were prominent, and after a debate between Professor Pollock and health authority officials in the presence of the local medical committee, the committee wrote:

> "Members were most unhappy that at the end of the open meeting far too many unanswered questions remained. There was a distinct lack of clarity in the replies from the health authority. We feel that serious questions raised by Professor Pollock have not been answered."

I feel strongly that the criticisms of the University College London unit are not based on evidence taken by the Committee. Whatever the motives of the supporters of those paragraphs, they fit nicely with the Department of Health's aim of silencing critics—but I am not impugning the members of the Committee, whom, as I have said, I thoroughly respect.

The paragraphs try to silence further criticism and punish severely—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. Will the hon. Gentleman look towards winding up his comments now?

Dr. Taylor: Certainly, Mr. Olner.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): If the hon. Gentleman does so, his time will be extended a little.

Dr. Naysmith: Can the hon. Gentleman give an example of how any criticism has been silenced in any way whatever by anything that has happened?

Dr. Taylor: I do not have the details, although I can provide them after the debate. Two people's criticisms were reported anonymously because they would not give their names.

An academic who is too critical becomes labelled as a campaigner and is then accused of losing scientific objectivity. The paragraphs in question should be withdrawn, because I believe they damage both the Committee and the unit. I am delighted to have had the opportunity to make my feelings clear. I have today received some comments about a PFI-built magistrates court in my constituency, and they strengthen my worries about the PFI in future. It is only a matter of time—perhaps it will happen even within the lifetime of this Government—before Professor Pollock and her unit will be shown to have been right, and I would hate the Committee on which I serve to have backed the wrong horse.

3.57 pm

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): I share the view of most of those who have spoken that it is amazing how much agreement there is in the report, given the potentially controversial area we considered and the different starting points of many members of the Committee. We all accepted that, in the short term at least, using the private sector could make an impact on achieving what we all want—an improved NHS with emphasis on reducing waiting lists— and we all shared a disappointment that in the private sector there are few examples of good practice. Given the huge subject we examined, there are many positive aspects in the report.

I should like the Government to examine further a few points concerning the concordat. In paragraph 31, we stated that money should not be allocated for private sector providers only. That is clear and just. It cannot be justified to give money to areas with private sector facilities. Money should be given on the basis of need. This is not an area in which money could not be spent by other places without private sector hospitals. If any part of the NHS was asked whether it wanted money to help to reduce waiting lists or to improve another sector of its health care, it would say yes and that it could use the money well. The Government's response to that is encouraging, but not encouraging enough. It states that the Government are trying to focus as much money on primary care trusts as possible, allowing them to decide how to spend it, but want to retain the ability to put more money into private sector units only. I hope that the Minister will assure us that that will not happen.

Paragraph 46 of the report refers to the training levy. There is still a strong case for considering such a levy on private sector providers. I know that that is an old chestnut that the Committee keeps pursuing, but it is right to do so.

[Ms Julia Drown]

Paragraph 39 mentions the use of reference costs to look for value for money. The Government response states:

> "Best prices are unlikely to be obtained by spot purchasing".

It also suggests that larger volumes, more evenly spread across years, might produce better results. I hope that the Government retain—I think the response hinted that they might—the idea that spot purchasing does provide better value for money, and that it varies from area to area. When one considers that private sector hospitals were already functioning very well before the NHS arrived and gave them more work, there is a strong case for saying that the money that the NHS pays for procedures should not be much more than marginal. The more that that idea is pushed from the centre, the more we can strengthen the bargaining hand of those negotiating locally.

On concordat activity within PFI, the report stresses the costs of not proceeding. There is a cost not only to the individual as regards having to wait for better quality treatment, but to families, the wider society, business, social services and other government budgets, such as those for benefits. We need joined-up government so that when we examine the costs and benefits of measures taken in the health economy, we consider the impact on the whole of government. Perhaps if more building schemes were established, and action on waiting lists was taken more quickly—be it in the private or public sector—the cost to the Government could be reduced.

I want to concentrate on the more controversial areas because they offer more interesting debate. I hope that all hon. Members agree that there is nothing magic about the private sector. Sometimes the Government hint that private sector management can perform magic, or can do what public sector management cannot. That is not the case, and I was pleased recently when the Government emphasised more strongly the quality of public sector managers and their ability to deliver for the NHS and all public services. It is important to hang on to them because we rely on them to work throughout the country to deliver better services.

On the NHS, I hope that we have all gone beyond the "public good, private bad" idea, which has fuelled debate. I understand those people who are cautious of PFI because my initial reaction was to be incredibly suspicious, particularly in Tory times when I would not trust the Conservatives with the NHS or a PFI. However, even under the Tories, I accepted the argument that giving a private sector builder a cheque to build a hospital, with which he could then run away, is different from asking a private sector partner to build a hospital, cheques for which will be given in 30 instalments only if the hospital delivers. That changes the psychology of the transaction and can mean that a private sector company will build a hospital differently. I have seen that happen in Swindon: an engagement with our local trust means that more thought is going into the materials being used for the hospital—the builders are considering whether to use easy-to-clean materials and double insulation in the roof so that the hospital can save £250,000 over the lifetime of the contract. Those ideas are different and worthy of piloting. That did not happen during the Tory years, as we hinted at in the report.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Why does not my hon. Friend suggest that the advantages that she outlines could also be contained in a public sector scheme?

Ms Drown: Simply because a public sector scheme in which a building is paid for up front with one cheque offers no financial incentive to deliver over 30 years. An agreement with a company that states that it will get payment only if the hospital is delivered and properly maintained might ensure delivery. Dividing the finances over years might provide an incentive. We do not know whether that is the case, which is why, for lessons to be learned, PFI should be examined in the context of a pilot scheme.

As PFI is so new, the Government should be more wary of its schemes. We will clearly learn lessons from PFI schemes; we have already learned some. We learn lessons from public schemes all the time. So, the case for PFI is not proven, but nor has it been dismissed. It will become harder for each PFI to prove value for money because the cost of new work, such as that in Swindon where we are adding extra roof insulation, must be spread across the NHS, through publicly financed projects and PFI projects.

That calculation needs to be fed in each time because there will be diminishing gains for the private sector. Nevertheless, we should see whether this different way of using the private sector delivers more for patients and staff. The ultimate test is whether we are delivering something better for the population. By closing our minds to the idea, we might be saying no to something that could improve the NHS.

I turn now to the controversial paragraphs of the report, which we rightly examined in detail. If we hear warning bells that some of the analysis does not add up, and if we are to include in our report lots of quotes from a particular unit, giving that unit some authority, we need to say where the warning bells are ringing. Other hon. Members have already referred to the question whether the unit confuses capital charges and PFI—it does. When the unit was asked whether those were two distinct matters, it said that they were, but subsequently confused them again. In its evidence to the Committee, which is supposed to make the two issues clear, it says that there are two problems. Table 3 on page 358 of the appendices shows the cost of capital as a percentage of income, pre and post-PFI. The figures for the Swindon and Marlborough NHS trust, which I know best, are as follows: capital as a percentage of income, pre-PFI is 3.3 per cent.; capital as a percentage of projected income, post-PFI, is 14.3 per cent. Where is the column giving the cost due to capital charges from a new hospital? Where is the column showing the cost of capital charges if we do nothing? It is not there. All the difference between capital as a percentage of income pre-PFI and post-PFI is put down to PFI. That is simply not a good analysis because there would be an increase in capital as a percentage of all income if any building development went ahead. If we built exactly the same hospital as part of a publicly financed project, on the current estimate, it would cost a little bit more, so the percentage would be greater. If we did nothing, the cost would be somewhere in between.

It is absolutely right that we should say when we see that things are wrong. We must get better reports from University College, London and from others. I am not denying that there are real issues to be considered in respect of PFI, but the evidence must be accurate and must stand up. At the moment, some of the analysis is lost because it does not stand up and the Government can rightly dismiss it. We need to deal with the relevant concerns about PFI, not spurious ones. My concern is that PFI raises fear in the population. As it is new, people are understandably wary of it.

Mr. Hopkins: I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that an opinion poll suggests that 83 per cent. of the population are opposed to private companies being used in the health service. Is my hon. Friend saying that the public support it?

Ms Drown: I am saying that people's initial reaction is to be wary of it. We all have a real love of the NHS and want everything to be done publicly, but that is not how the NHS is run. Virtually every supplier to the NHS is a profit-making business.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): If that is true, where on earth do people think that the drugs and pharmaceuticals used in the health service would come from? Or would that 83 per cent. of the population prefer people to go untreated?

Ms Drown: That is precisely the point. Almost every supplier to the NHS has a profit motive. There might be a problem of public understanding that we need to work on. There has always been a partnership. However, the worry might be partly fuelled by analysis that suggests that any PFI hospital will have to be paid for by staff savings. That is not what happens. New public sector schemes cost more. Perhaps one lesson to be learned from PFI is that while the NHS has always tried to scrimp and save and to build smaller hospitals, lots of PFI hospitals are big. This is about getting it right the first time round—we shall not know whether we have done so for another 25 years, but we need to consider the matter.

Mr. Burns: Does the hon. Lady accept that if her constituents were given the choice between having their operations next week in a private hospital, but paid for by the NHS free at the point of delivery, and waiting for nine months for the health service to do it, the vast majority would opt for the former?

Ms Drown: That is right. Some people in Swindon have used private hospitals and I have heard good reports of them. It should not always have to happen, but we need to be flexible. What matters to me is to deliver the best possible health care for my constituents, and if that means some of them going to the Ridgeway hospital, that is a good thing. We must not confuse the issues.

I mentioned the belief that a PFI scheme has to be paid for by staff savings and the fact that, for its new scheme, Swindon had to spend 14 per cent. of its income on capital charges. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) will know that work by the unit on the Wakefield scheme has shown that the public sector option there will cost 13 per cent. That is higher than four of the PFI projects in the table. Where is the balance? We have to make sure that the right arguments are advanced.

The Committee was right to say that it is not inevitable that a PFI project will lead to a bed reduction. When I was working on this, I had a student attached to me—a Hansard scholar—who surveyed all chief executives and asked them to tell him their concerns about PFI, the benefits and the disadvantages. He received a good response and I thank the chief executives for that. Not one responded with a worry about beds, which had been a matter of concern to the Committee. One mentioned a real frustration about the huge confusion over PFI and the fact that people thought that it would lead to a reduction in beds. We have moved on a long way with the beds inquiry and I am pleased to see the Government's undertaking to be clear about bed numbers in future. We need to make sure that the debate is clear—the message from the survey of chief executives was that bed numbers should be agreed before we go on to the next stage.

I should like to pick up the point about the MRI scanners and staff savings. The issue was not put before the Committee as evidence of things that happen. It was simply used to illustrate that it is important for the NHS to accept that sometimes spending more on capital items and less on staff can deliver a better service. Unless that point is understood, we shall not be able to explain why sometimes building a bigger structure or having a private finance scheme that is bigger than a conventionally procured scheme might be better. It might be, for example, that in Swindon we get the right departments next to each other, whereas if we just stayed on site we would have 10 years of disruption and all the departments in the wrong places. That could be a gain. It could mean that we can deliver services with fewer staff. Having fewer staff might sound like a bad thing, but it could be a good thing if it meant better services for patients. That is why it is crucial to the debate.

In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield, University College, London is not the only unit providing analysis. Our report quoted the office of health economics. We want to get good analysis both from UCL and from elsewhere.

Finally, with regard to who wrote the report, it was leaked that I wrote the paragraphs and we have heard double-conspiracy theories. I am happy to say that I wrote them. The paragraphs concerned criticism of the Government. Would the Government really produce criticisms of themselves and put them into a report? Let us have more balance and look for a way forward that addresses the real concerns that surround PFI—the things that we have to watch. We should not let arguments that do not stand up stay with us. We were right as a Committee to address them and to say that they are wrong.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. I remind the four Members who are standing that, as I indicated earlier, I shall be asking the Opposition spokesmen to start summing up just before a quarter to 5. I leave the hon. Gentlemen to do the arithmetic: you have half an hour between you.

4.15 pm

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North): It is a great pleasure to take part in this important debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on his excellent presentation, and I strongly agree with him, although I might have gone rather further. Perhaps his moderate tone reflects the fact that he is taking a consensual approach and speaking on behalf of the Committee. He is a fine and strong defender of the NHS and he is concerned about its long-term future, as I am.

Before saying anything specific, I should note that I am associated with two health service trade unions—the GMB and Unison—but I am speaking on behalf of my constituents and myself.

In a previous debate on this issue I said that PFI was irrational nonsense, and nothing that I have heard or read since has changed my view. Indeed, I would go further and say it is dangerous, and I shall return to that. A Unison pamphlet published when the Conservatives introduced PFI—let us not forget that it was a Conservative idea—suggested that it was the beginning of the creeping privatisation of the NHS, and that huge sums would be taken out of the health service to satisfy the whims of private capital. I can see no argument against that view. Indeed, the financial press suggests that £30 billion in profit is to be made from the public services when privatisation really gets going. That money will have to come from somewhere, and it will come from the public purse.

We can see from the example of the USA the direction in which we are going. Health provision there is essentially private, and it consumes about twice the proportion of GDP that the British health service does. Yet it does not provide for all its citizens, and millions of Americans have no health care. The USA has a bloated, inefficient privatised health sector, and we are in danger of going in that direction.

Mr. Burns: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman developing his argument, but is he seriously suggesting that the Government are moving towards privatising the health service?

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Before I call Mr. Kelvin Hopkins, I should remind him that any interventions will take up some of his seven and a half minutes.

Mr. Hopkins: Indeed, Mr. Olner. I am trying both to be as generous as possible and to ensure that points are covered.

The answer to the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) is that I am suggesting that we shall move towards privatisation of the health service if the Government full-bloodedly pursue PFI, but I hope that they will not. In their defence, I should say that the Chancellor made the strong and principled point that at the point of need, health care will be paid for out of the public purse. That is an absolute principle. We are talking about privatising not the payment for health services but their provision; that is what I am deeply concerned about. Privatised provision will cost a lot more because the private sector will require a large return on its services. The more it provides, the more profit we will have to fund and the more it will cost the public purse. I suggest that the private sector is looking to public services as a milch cow, to replace manufacturing, in which profit returns are not as great as they were. Public services are the future, and privatisation is seen as the way forward.

Let me give an example. My hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) may want to intervene on me here, but I gather from press reports that the hospital in Swindon cost £98 million to build and will require payments of £12 million a year for 30 years. At the same time, £74 million of Government money has had to be lobbed in to boost the project. Vast sums are therefore already being spent on hospitals.

A PFI hospital unit is being built in my constituency. The choice was either no extra unit or PFI, so the authorities took PFI. I am sure that it will be a fine building, but it will undoubtedly cost more. It has also taken a vast amount of management resources and trust capacity to get it built, and it costs much more than it would in the public sector.

Ms Drown: Despite the figures that are floated, some of the extra money that my hon. Friend said had been lobbed in was for equipment. It was decided that the new equipment would be better funded by the public sector; I would have thought that he would support that.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order.

Mr. Hopkins: I thank my hon. Friend for that information, but I suggest that what I have described will happen in time. Hospitals cannot be allowed to fail, so the Government and the public sector always bear the risk, and it cannot be transferred. Hospitals will say that they need extra money for more equipment and so on. Indeed, I suspect that as time goes by, hospitals will demand more and more money from the public sector—from the trusts and other bodies.

The real problem—I have cut a large portion of my speech to make this point, Mr. Olner—is that the Treasury does not want more public borrowing. It does not want the public sector borrowing requirement to rise. It wants to keep the PSBR low, and to achieve that it has to find the money elsewhere—from the private sector. However, public borrowing is extremely cheap. It has never been cheaper. Long-term interest rates are very low; they have fallen below those on the continent of Europe for the first time in ages. The Government have the scope to borrow on the long-term markets at an almost zero rate of interest.

Jim Dowd: Where would the Government get the money? Does anyone in the private sector make money out of Government borrowing?

Mr. Hopkins: I have many friends in the City, and they tell me that the City is gagging to lend money to the Government. They want more gilt-edged investments.

Jim Dowd: So they are making money?

Mr. Hopkins: The private sector is making money, but it wants to lend to the Government because Governments do not become bankrupt. Governments are a low-risk investment, and a long-term, genuine and guaranteed return can be made. The City has a shortage of Government borrowing. The problem is that the Treasury is trying to keep the PSBR down for other political reasons, but I shall not speculate on those.

If the Government wished to, they could borrow the money and build in the traditional way in the public sector more cheaply, which would save the public purse vast amounts of money. That extra money could be used to build more hospitals and provide more facilities, and we could then solve the real problem of British health, which is that we do not spend enough money on it. In Britain we spend 2 or 3 per cent. less on health than is spent in France, 4 or 5 per cent. less than is spent in Germany and probably 6 or 7 per cent. less than is spent by the bloated American private sector.

Our problem is one of resources. If we spent more on health, many of the problems would disappear—especially those mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew). I am completely and wholly unconvinced by the PFI scheme. It is about global mega-politics, and it has nothing to do with the real interests of the people of Britain—either their health or their pockets.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Harrow, West): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins), whose passion on this topic I respect. However, I support continuing partnerships between the independent sector in its widest form and the national health service.

I shall highlight one example of positive collaboration between those two sectors that is presently under threat. I welcome the continued scrutiny of public partnerships; the Select Committee has done an excellent job. I want to focus on the Committee's first recommendation—independent assessment of the impact on the NHS of the activities of independent providers. I hope that if the Select Committee returns to the subject, it will take account of the impact of clinical research carried out in the independent sector.

I would be delighted if it were to take a look at the Mount Vernon hospital, which serves my constituency. Independent sector research organisations such as the Cancer Research Campaign's Gray cancer institute, the Paul Strickland scanner centre, the Marie Curie research wing, the Linda Jackson Macmillan centre and Sir Michael Sobell house have an extremely positive relationship with the excellent NHS cancer centre on the Mount Vernon site.

Sadly, that joint working across independent sector organisations and the NHS is threatened by the last, dying recommendation made by the NHS eastern region before it was abolished in April. It suggested that the cancer centre at Mount Vernon hospital should be moved off the site at some point. The key reason cited for shifting that excellent centre, and throwing into doubt all its important cancer services and research, was that Mount Vernon lacked a district general hospital. That is a key criterion that is suggested in the 1995 Calman-Hine report as necessary to improve the quality of cancer services.

Why does Mount Vernon not have a district general hospital on site? The key part of such a hospital—full-blown accident and emergency services—was shut in 1996. That was an appalling decision by the then Government. Many of us knew at the time that it would come back to haunt us and affect the specialist services and the excellent independent sector research on the site.

The Gray laboratory—the key Cancer Research Campaign research site—opened in 1957, and quickly became renowned for its radiobiological research. The Paul Strickland scanner centre opened in 1985, and is another non-profit-making organisation in the independent sector. It facilitates research and provides a range of important services to NHS patients. Also on the site is Sir Michael Sobell house, an independent sector hospice that offers palliative care and helps with specialist support to the NHS cancer centre. The Cancer Research Campaign's tumour biology and radiation therapy group is also based in the cancer centre's research wing. It provides important advice and support to NHS services on the site.

The Gray laboratory has campaigned hard against the proposal made by the NHS eastern region. It highlighted to local people the fact that the region's report made no in-depth analysis of the cost to the Cancer Research Campaign of shifting its facility should the cancer centre move. The laboratory had been involved in a series of clinical initiatives at Mount Vernon with important implications for the NHS and the development of the treatment of cancer, which may be hugely important to us all.

The Mount Vernon cancer network will become a research network next year. In keeping with other such networks, it will receive special funding to support increased involvement in clinical trials. Clearly, its effectiveness would be under threat if the proposal from the NHS eastern region were accepted and implemented.

Concern has been expressed in my constituency since the proposal was made public, and people think that the future of the whole hospital is under threat. I am sure that all hon. Members will understand that. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister can confirm that there are no plans to close the hospital in its entirety, and that there will now be genuine consultation on the future of the cancer centre on that site, not least in view of its important research links with organisations in the independent sector such as the Cancer Research Campaign.

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West): I can assure you, Mr. Olner, that I have thrown away three pages of my speech, and I shall take no more than five minutes.

I shall comment on the suggestion made in some quarters that our report pulls its punches or has in some way been watered down. A couple of inferences of that sort have been made this afternoon, but I do not believe it to be the case. The view seems to have arisen because of the furore surrounding Professor Pollock's evidence, which we have already discussed, and the famous paragraphs 65 to 69. That has led to calls for the withdrawal of parts of the report, accusations of infringement of academic freedom, and much else.

I believe that the true explanation of the fuss lies elsewhere, however—with the Committee's failure to find any robust evidence for the theory that hospitals built under private finance initiatives inevitably end up with fewer beds than they should have. We heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) about the shortage of beds at his local hospital. In fact, the evidence that we gathered suggested that when hospitals of that generation were being planned, and the theory was at its height, other forces were at work to reduce bed numbers. Those forces have since been reversed, thank goodness. Many people accepted the theory, however, and used it as a strong plank against PFI schemes. To discover that it may not be true causes them difficulties, and bashing the report may be one way in which they can obscure those difficulties.

We heard from the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) about the political debt that he owes personally to some criticisms of PFI. I wonder how much of that debt arises from criticisms about bed numbers in some of the hospitals with which he was involved being affected by PFI. There is little evidence for that theory.

Our investigation was serious and asked searching and important questions about the current and potential role of private sector organisations, finance and medicine in the national health service. Let us consider how different news organisations chose to emphasise different aspects of the report on its publication. The BBC "Today" programme focused on the dual role of consultants in the NHS and the private sector. BBC television and the Financial Times highlighted the fact that paying for patients to have private care to cut waiting lists might not represent value for money. The Bath Chronicle emphasised our call for more openness about NHS-private links, especially the need for information about contract prices. The Evening Standard emphasised our worry about the long-term effects of the concordat on the NHS. The Independent and the Daily Mail said that MPs were warning against seeking a quick cure, emphasising that short-term help involving the private sector must not prevent the NHS from developing more capacity in the long term. The Morning Star said, "Health watchdog airs doubts about value of PFI", while The Times and the Bristol Evening Post focused on our conclusion that PFI did not reduce bed numbers.

Lots of topics, and the two chapters on LIFT and pathology services, were hardly mentioned. Only The Guardian, and later The Daily Telegraph, concentrated on the strange tale of how the Chair of our Committee

> "was blocked in his attempts to criticise the Government for using the private sector to build and run NHS services."

It is a great pity that the press focused on that story, as it suppressed many of the good things in the report.

The report contains several criticisms of the Government's involvement with the private sector, almost all of them signed up to by the Committee without votes needing to be taken. The Committee made 32 recommendations, of which the Government fully accept 14 and reject three outright. Of the remaining 15, they say that they partially accept our view, or are already doing, or plan to do, something similar to our recommendation. Although monitoring must be carried out to ensure that some of the partially or conditionally accepted recommendations become reality, I do not consider that a bad score. I hope that our Committee will play a part in ensuring that those actions are taken, and I shall listen for further assurances from the Minister.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): I have a few more moments than I was expecting, but I promise not to misuse them. First, I am delighted to speak on the report that the Committee of which I am privileged and pleased to be a member has presented today. The report is unanimous, although it is obvious, to paraphrase George Orwell, that some parts are more unanimous than others.

We took on an ambitious remit. The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who is sadly not here at the moment, said that we investigated private health care, but we did not. The report's title is deliberately specific—it refers to the role of the private sector in the national health service. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Dr. Naysmith), who was admirably succinct, summed up the generality of the report. The issues surrounding PFI and a couple of paragraphs in that commentary have attracted a disproportionate amount of attention, which has detracted to some degree, although I hope not lastingly, from the body of work that we have put before the House.

The role of the private sector in the NHS, despite what others may say, is, as the report sets out, as old as the service itself. I felt that my colleagues on the Committee and I were taking part in a serious analysis of certain private sector activities relating to health care provision. We did not examine, for example, the private sector's role in running the acute sector and the provision of services, drugs or pharmaceuticals, or the other support services that it provides to one of our premier national public services. The report is not definitive in terms of the private sector's entire role, but we considered those areas in which private sector involvement has grown and changed in recent times.

I am forgetting my manners. I must congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), on the almost universal good humour with which he managed sessions that were sometimes very tendentious and contentious. I also pay tribute to the assiduous work of the Committee staff who supported us.

The PFI has attracted the most concern, although what the Committee suggests is what everybody really knows in their bones—PFI is not an entity, but a process that can be well or badly managed. One of our recommendations relates to the need to maintain a consistent corpus of management skill and to ensure its availability to all those who are embarking on PFI processes in the health service and elsewhere. PFI is not simply restricted to health service capital provision.

One of the reasons that I brought such enthusiasm to the inquiry is that, during my years on Lewisham and North Southwark district health authority and something called Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham area health authority (teaching), I saw a lot of public money being simply thrown down the drain because of how traditional capital projects were managed in the NHS. I will not bore the Chamber with stories of Guy's phase 3, as I am sure the Minister is well aware of it. That scheme is 300 per cent. over budget and still unfinished many years after it was supposed to be.

There are other stories from our part of south London, including that of the Jubilee line extension, which was £1.5 billion over budget and two years late. I am fairly sure that had it not been for the imperative of the dome—good or ill, however one judges it—the project would probably not be finished yet. Billions more of public money would simply have been wasted.

I am happy to argue with my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) about comparative marginal interest rates on borrowing, but I am not prepared to borrow money at 6 per cent. and just pour it down the drain. I want to ensure that that public money is spent to best public effect. All public services are fundamentally an alliance between three parties: the producers, the users—patients in the health service example—and the taxpayers. In our examination, we took evidence equally and representatively from all three, but it is often more difficult to estimate where the interests of that last group, the taxpayers who pay for the service, best lie.

I would like a different public procurement system that protects the interests of taxpayers in a way that has not happened previously and which is not so prone to incompetence and waste. Of the many PFI matters that the report assesses, the most difficult to calculate is the value of intangibles such as risk transfer, value for money and long-term facilities management. Nearly all those who have spoken in the debate, and others like them, have said, in effect, "There is a PFI hospital in my constituency. I don't like or want it, but if it weren't for that, we wouldn't have a new hospital at all." There is a calculation to bear in mind: what price does one put on giving treatment to people on the one hand, and denying it to them on the other? [Interruption.] I see you signalling to me, Mr. Olner.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): One last go.

Mr. Dowd: I shall move on to my semi-last point.

Our recommendation on pay beds, which is extremely mild, clearly so confused the Department that it managed to respond out of order in the document, putting (d) before (c). There is more that we can do on that. If we have private health care provision on NHS premises and buy in private health care on the ground that there is spare capacity in other parts of the health care community, we really should consider how to rationalise those things.

One of the issues that complicates PFI is the unfolding policies of NHS Estates. I draw attention to a recent decision that all new schemes must include 50 per cent. individual rooms. I say to the Minister that that will cause havoc in the next waves of PFI and the broader capital programme as well as in recalculating the number of beds that are affordable in the short term and, more particularly, in the long term. There will be questions of primary care trust affordability in the long run. Will he respond on that?

There is plenty more that I could say, Mr. Olner, but you will be pleased to know that I shall not say it.

4.42 pm

Sandra Gidley (Romsey): As a new member of the Select Committee, this is the first inquiry in which I have been involved. The process has been an eye-opener. I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), the Chairman of the Committee. He had a difficult job, because it was clear from the outset that there is a wide range of opinions on the issue.

Some of us started with a very negative view of PFI, but my opinion has shifted. Although I am still sceptical, I no longer think it the spawn of all evil. Others seemed keen to ignore any negative comments on PFI, so it was a surprise and a delight that the Committee managed to produce a broadly consensual report, even though the process involved a healthy debate on almost every paragraph. Although we have a document that balances those opinions cleverly, sadly it ultimately adds little to the debate in many respects. I shall return to that point.

In effect, the jury is still out on PFI. I cannot talk about the Government response until I have dealt with the thorny matter of the infamous paragraphs 65 to 69, which cover the evidence given by University College, London. I am a new member of the Select Committee, so perhaps I misunderstood what we were supposed to do. I agree with the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) that the main function of a Select Committee is to scrutinise, but I am not convinced that we scrutinised properly in this case. I feel strongly that if we do not like the answers given, our job is to probe those answers.

By extension, if the evidence given by that unit was so dreadful, why did we not probe it and challenge it more at the time instead of making a late recommendation in the report? I had problems with that. Although I agree to a certain extent that some evidence given by that unit was not as good as it could have been, other evidence given by other bodies could fall into that category. It is up to us to highlight all the organisations, and not pick on one. We should have made more strenuous efforts to obtain answers at the time.

I do not want to dwell on the point, but the UCL evidence is particularly important because that unit's research underpins many reports and examples in which PFI is shown in a negative light. We are also dealing with perceptions—appearing too critical of the unit and trying to expose weaknesses in the evidence of others.

Ms Drown: Does the hon. Lady accept that we also made pains to criticise the private sector where we did not have enough evidence from it? We examined the Government's arguments and said where they did not add up. I reiterate the point that I made to other hon. Members: if we see something wrong, do we not have to say so, particularly when it has such a big influence on the debate? We must make the right criticisms of Government policy, not the wrong ones, and make them clearly.

Sandra Gidley: I have said that I agree with the hon. Lady's basic premise, and it was incumbent on the Committee to challenge that evidence more robustly and vigorously at the time so our recommendations would not come as a complete surprise when they were published. I would like to move on, because the debate on paragraphs 65 to 69 has overshadowed this wide-ranging and important report, which has been much ignored.

[Sandra Gidley]

First, the concordat. In the short term, of course it is expedient to use any spare capacity to reduce waiting lists. After all, that is what the public want. They do not care where they get their operations; they just want to have them. We must be careful, because that is a double-edged sword. We have a resources problem regarding doctors, nurses and other health professionals. The situation is improving, but there is still a problem. Increased use of the private sector inevitably means increased demand for nurses, many of whom currently work on an agency basis in the private sector. Nurses can do only so much, and the private sector is in a much better position to offer incentives to attract nurses from the NHS. The Government must ensure that there is no steady drift of staff from the NHS to the private sector.

Every pound directed to that sector has the potential to weaken the resource pool of the NHS, and I do not think that we have the complete answer to that yet. The signs are that there is a move towards bigger contracts under the concordat, which represents even greater potential for erosion of the NHS. I must ask whether that is what we really want.

The Committee also highlighted concerns about pay beds in NHS hospitals. Some hospitals generate a revenue stream from their pay beds, and they can prove that quite easily. However, that does not seem to be the case for other hospitals. The Government's response indicates that NHS trusts should examine the cost-effectiveness of such beds. We all agree with that. It also says that the first priority is treatment of NHS patients. That could be interpreted as meaning that private patients should wait longer, but it is widely acknowledged that convenience and speed of treatment are key reasons for people choosing private health care. Will the Minister say how that would be monitored? Would there be a report back to the House in due course? Those are all important pointers if we are to obtain an accurate view as to how the private sector truly impacts on the NHS.

I must also raise concerns about the new consultant contract, which does not appear to be as widely loved as the Secretary of State might have led us to believe when he gave evidence to the Committee. I could have this wrong, but I understand that consultants put in the first 48 hours for the NHS and are then free to pursue private sector work while the rest of the world must work to the working time directive. People such as air traffic controllers and lorry drivers have carefully controlled working hours, but we seem to be encouraging consultants to flaunt those good principles in the worst possible way.

Mr. Hopkins: The hon. Lady will be interested in yesterday's report that long hours and lack of sleep are major causes of heart attacks, which is especially significant for the health service.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right and there are probably statistics that show that consultant is a fairly stressful occupation. Have the Government considered monitoring the hours that consultants work, because there are implications for patient safety?

Accounting is a complex area and I do not claim to have "Mastermind" knowledge of all the finer points of public sector comparators, value for money and the intricacies of discount rates. I would be surprised if any member of the Committee appeared on "Mastermind" to answer questions on those subjects. It was obvious that witnesses also had serious problems understanding the intricacies of the subject. Despite the professed openness, there is still far too much scope for manipulation of the figures to present a business case. I am an old-fashioned girl and my parents always warned me against buying anything on hire purchase, which, like PFI, provides a quick fix. The problem is 18 years of underfunding. Of course people are delighted to have their new hospitals, but in the long term one will pay more.

One problem with some PFI projects is staffing. Problems are at a minimum where strenuous attempts have been made to retain staff in the NHS and to incorporate them into teams. In Carlisle, more maintenance and cleaning staff were contracted out, which caused a number of problems that have already been alluded to. Existing staff contracted out under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 had different contractual arrangements from new staff, which clearly gave rise to a two-tier system.

The differences are most striking when one considers staff overtime. It was much cheaper for the PFI contractor to use the newer staff, who were on a lower overtime rate, and the net effect was a drop in take-home pay for existing workers. If that situation is allowed to continue, the unions could bring a discrimination case. I hope that the Minister considers that matter closely to allow all those who are effectively working for the NHS to do so on an equitable basis.

Mr Bill Olner (in the Chair): I would be grateful if the hon. Lady concluded in the next minute.

Sandra Gidley: Okay. I was going to talk about training levies, on which I was disappointed by the Government's response, but I shall not do so. I regret that this is the first inquiry that we undertook. Although it was a hot political issue at the time and we made our choice, there was too little evidence for us to produce a hard-hitting, positive report. In hindsight, it would have been useful for the Committee to wait until more evidence was available and firmer conclusions could have been reached. We would have been able to produce a report that, instead of asking for further work to give insight to the answers, would probably have provided more clear-cut conclusions and recommendations.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): I begin by offering my congratulations and thanks to the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on how he conducted and guided us through the inquiry. As a member of a minority—some might say a persecuted minority—I am indebted to the Chairman for the fairness and decency with which he conducts our business to ensure that my minority party gets a fair share of time, in proportion to its representation on the Committee.

It has been a fascinating experience, listening to the debate and seeing the continuing battles between old and new Labour. If the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) had remained as Secretary of State instead of embarking on his ill-fated campaign to become mayor of London, we would probably not have had to conduct the inquiry because the concordat would not have been drawn up in such a way. It has also been fascinating to hear the comments of the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins). At one point, I was worried that there would be a punch-up between him and his so-called hon. Friend, the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd).

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Not under my chairmanship.

Mr. Burns: I apologise, Mr. Olner.

On the other hand, we have new Labour—the new broom that sweeps clean—in the Secretary of State, who has negotiated and developed the concordat with a zeal that I suspect has come as a tremendous surprise to the hon. Member for Wakefield and many other dinosaurs, as I suspect his Whips Office would call them, on the Labour Back Benches. The report states:

> "The opening sentence of the Concordat marked a significant shift in Government policy: 'There should be no organisational or ideological barriers to the delivery of high quality healthcare free at the point of delivery to those who need it, when they need it'."

This may come as a surprise, but I wholeheartedly agree with those sentiments.

As several hon. Members have said, their constituents, like mine, really do not mind who provides their treatment, as long as it is of the highest quality, as quick as possible and free at the point of use. Whether treatment is given in the private sector or at the local NHS hospital is, to all intents and purposes, and despite the opinion poll of the hon. Member for Luton, North, which I suspect was conducted at the last Unison conference, irrelevant to our constituents, because they have a different priority.

The concordat goes far beyond what anyone on 1 May 1997, let alone during the election campaign leading up to that date, thought that a Labour Government would contemplate doing. One must ask why Labour, having crucified the Conservative Government, who were deeply committed to the principles of the NHS and for ever being accused by the then Opposition of wanting to privatise the health service when they had no intention of doing so, has decided to do what the Conservatives never would have contemplated in a month of Sundays.

In a significant contribution, the hon. Member for Luton, North accused his own Government of potential privatisation of the NHS. It may surprise the Minister, but even I do not accept such a Machiavellian thought process. The hon. Member for Luton, North completely misses the point of the concordat—this is where the Minister and I may start to diverge—which has been created by the Government's near obsession with targets and their desire to meet their 1997 election promise to bring down waiting times. Finding, after 18 months or so in power, that they were having significant problems meeting their political targets, they went for what is, basically, a sensible option: using spare capacity in the private sector for NHS patients to be treated free at the point of use.

The Government are right to do that. If there is a capacity problem in the NHS, rather than let our constituents suffer by waiting longer, why not use spare capacity through negotiated deals with the private sector, providing that treatment is free at the point of use? That, I understand, is what the Government have done through the concordat.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Will the hon. Gentleman, in his attempts to understand the concerns that some of us have about the direction that the Government are taking, reflect on what the Conservative Government did in privatising care of the elderly at a cost, according not to me, but to Mr. William Laing of Laing and Buisson, of at least £10 billion in social security subsidies? As the hon. Gentleman well knows, homes are being closed on profit and loss considerations rather than the interests of old people. That is why one or two of us have slight reservations over private sector involvement.

Mr. Burns: I am genuinely sorry that, due to Health Committee commitments on Monday night, the hon. Gentleman did not have the good fortune to be in the Chamber for the care homes debate. If he had been there to listen to the speeches with great care—I recommend that he read them—he would understand that his analysis is, sadly, off the mark.

I do not think that anyone who cares about the vulnerable, and has an ounce of decency in them, would disagree with the principle adhered to by the Government in the 1980s, which I suspect is also the principle of this Government. Instead of keeping the elderly in long-stay hospitals with a minimal quality of life and dignity, those hospitals should be closed to enable the patients to have an enhanced quality of care, whether in a residential home or in their own home with a domiciliary care package, where relevant.

Just as this Government, because of the shortage in NHS capacity, have had to seek out the private sector and use its spare capacity, at that time, the private sector—in most cases, although not all, as there was some NHS and local authority provision—helped to make up the shortage of capacity and to meet demand. I make no apology for that. It was the only alternative to the grim and in some ways almost Dickensian hospital wards, where sad, frail and vulnerable people had a miserable existence, not even a proper life.

I am grateful that the Government have produced a response in time for this debate. As time is short, I shall allude only briefly to one or two matters. Paragraph 21 of our recommendations says that the Department

> "should look at ways of providing further incentives to staff to work for the NHS."

I think that that is crucial, and so do the Government. In their response, they agree with the Committee that

> "it is very important that skilled individuals are incentivised to work for the NHS."

That is right and admirable. In elaborating on that response, the Government rightly discuss GP contracts, consultant contracts and important matters such as conditions and terms of employment for health care and other jobs.

I am concerned and surprised, however, that the response does not refer specifically to nurses. I have a concern that I would like the Minister to re-examine. As we found out at Prime Minister's Question Time yesterday, accommodation costs in London and the south-east are causing grave problems for the recruitment and retention of crucial staff in the NHS and other fields. As one measure to try to alleviate that problem, the Government have introduced cost-of-living supplements for nurses. Most home counties have been receiving those from the last financial year, although Essex has received them only from this financial year, which is odd as we adjoin London and have high housing costs. However, I welcome the fact that the Government have rectified that.

Even so, I remain concerned that only nurses of grade C and above are eligible for those supplements. That is a mistake. Many junior nurses who have spent many years working in the health service and who are skilled and highly trained up to their level find it difficult to cope with the cost of living in the south-east. Even so, that rule bars them from receiving the cost-of-living supplement. I hope that the Minister reconsiders and tries to persuade the Treasury to relax the rules.

As time is short, I shall raise two other matters briefly. The first concerns consultants. I wholeheartedly agree with the Government's rejection of the report's recommendation that details of payments for NHS activities made to consultants working in private settings should be published by trust boards. I do not believe that that would take us one iota further in the argument or serve any useful purpose. I am pleased that the Government agree with my assessment and have rejected that proposal.

Secondly, our Chairman is sharp and he does not often have the wool pulled over his eyes, but when the Secretary of State gave evidence during the concluding part of our inquiry he did a marvellous job—I hesitate to say that he used spin—in convincing the Chairman that there is no Government climbdown over the seven-year contract rule. In fact, we now know from the small print that the Government have caved in. Although they may have got what they claim to be concessions to enhance the NHS in other ways, on the central argument that is so close to the Chairman's heart, they gave in, although that was realistic and sensible.

Much has been said about PFI, so I shall be brief. It has been said that imitation is the greatest form of flattery, and I am glad that the Conservative Government have been flattered to the nth degree by this Government, who have embraced, enhanced, expedited and expanded the concept of PFI. It is a pity that I do not have more time to go through lexis nexus, but I would dearly love to know what the hon. Members for South Swindon (Ms Drown) and for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas), and perhaps the hon. Member for Lewisham, West, said in public statements on PFI before the 1997 general election. I suspect that they thought it an horrendous Conservative party conspiracy.

Ms Drown rose—

Jim Dowd rose—

Mr. Simon Burns: No, no. I suspect that they thought it a conspiracy, in the words of the hon. Member for Luton, North, to privatise the health service.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): The hon. Gentleman is about to conclude.

Mr. Burns: Yes, I am concluding, Mr. Olner.

I reject that accusation, because we were not proposing privatisation. If badly needed hospital facilities can be provided for our constituents more quickly than by going through the labyrinthine and neanderthal rules of the Treasury, that must be examined and, provided that we safeguard taxpayers' interests, embraced.

5.7 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): I am delighted to respond to what has generally been a good-tempered debate. It is clear to all of us who have listened to the exchanges that these matters have raised substantial and deep divisions of opinion throughout the House over the relationship between the private sector and the national health service.

I agree with everything that has been said about my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), who has done an exceptionally good job in chairing the Select Committee and continues to do so. He has produced a report that makes a useful contribution to the debate and has taken it a significant step forward.

I shall respond briefly to some of the many points raised by my hon. Friends and by Opposition Members, confining the closing section of my comments to the report and the Government's response to it. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield spoke eloquently and articulately about the relationship between the private sector and the NHS, making points about the PFI process and how he feels that it is skewed in favour of PFI rather than the public sector.

All members of the Select Committee are aware that that is not the view of the National Audit Office, which has examined many PFI schemes, including at least one in the NHS, and has reported that the risk figures have not been manipulated. It would be a huge mistake, and it is certainly not the Government's intention, to torture the PFI data until it confesses. That would not take the debate any further.

We must have an open and transparent debate. In our response, we set out a number of ways to improve that transparency, and it is important to the NHS and to the House that we have a rational debate on PFI. At least one of my hon. Friends convinced me that we have not yet made sufficient progress in that respect.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I have listened carefully to my right hon. Friend. He will recall that I referred specifically to comments made subsequent to our taking evidence from Mr. Coleman, which were reported in the Financial Times. Has my right hon. Friend had the chance to study those comments? They were quite strong on the public sector comparator.

Mr. Hutton: It came as a surprise when my hon. Friend cited those remarks. That is not the view of the NAO, which reported on PFI and, especially, on the public sector comparator, which was the basis of my hon. Friend's observations. The NAO has produced a number reports on the public sector comparator and the value for money aspects of PFI, and it confirms that PFI produces value for money. I am sure that there is an explanation, and I would be interested to hear Mr. Coleman's.

Ms Drown: The point is not that PFI always gives value for money, which is what my right hon. Friend is hinting at. Each case must be assessed on its own merits. The Committee recommends that more public sector capital is needed, so that we can genuinely compare one with the other rather than worry that people are trying to fix the statistics. That is crucial. I would be grateful if he responded to that point. I understand that the NAO report on the Dartford and Gravesham hospital says that the scheme was skewed—it was rather overestimated—but that it nevertheless provided value for money.

Mr. Hutton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right in relation to Dartford and Gravesham. The NAO report shows that it would produce savings of about £5 million for the taxpayer.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) is not with us. He is concerned that PFI does not produce savings for the taxpayer and therefore for the NHS, and he favours an exclusive reliance on public sector capital. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd) comprehensively debunked that argument, and I do not want to re-enter that territory. When it is clearly shown that PFI provides value for money, as in that case, I would expect all members of the Committee to sign up to greater objectivity in the PFI debate.

I am a little disappointed that the critics here today did not refer to the NAO report on the PFI. Our objective work on value for money has produced the result that PFI gives value for money. That result also means, as they say on the terraces, "It's all gone quiet over there." That is not a hallmark of a rational or transparent debate.

Mr. Burns: Is the Minister disappointed? Did he think it disappointing when the hon. Member for Luton, North suggested that if the Government continue with PFI, it will have the effect of the Government privatising the health service?

Mr. Hutton: I cannot say that I was surprised.

Mr. Burns: Disappointed?

Mr. Hutton: I was certainly disappointed. My hon. Friend has a substantial record of opposition to PFI, as do other of my hon. Friends. I have no problem with that difference of view. Fine; let us have the argument and let us hear the issues. It is certainly a gross caricature to present PFI as the privatisation of the NHS. I do not and would not subscribe to my hon. Friend's views.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Dr. Naysmith) told us how people reacted to the Committee's report. No one could say, having read it, that it does not pose hard and difficult questions on Government policy. That is the Committee's job, and we would be surprised if it had done anything less. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield and the members of the Committee, as the report is a significant step forward.

The hon. Member for Basildon—

Jim Dowd: Southend.

Mr. Hutton: Of course, he has moved to Southend. I apologise to the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess). That was genuinely not a deliberate slight; I have Basildon in my notes. Whenever we see him, we think of Basildon, and that will take some time to change, although not as long as it took him to move from Basildon. However, we do not want to go into that.

The hon. Gentleman likes to live in the past on the issues. He spent most of his time talking about what happened between 1997 and 1999. Fair dos. He is at liberty to approach the subject in that way, and I understand why he would prefer to live in the past. In those days, the Tories said that they would get elected and win general elections, but those days are over. My hon. Friends made pertinent comments in response to his speech. He and his colleagues must ask themselves why such an electoral calamity befell the Conservative party. In no small part, it was due to the Conservatives' record on NHS management. With respect—I do respect him—I have never heard him allude to that in his speeches on the NHS since 1997, which is a conspicuous omission.

The hon. Gentleman referred, as did many of my hon. Friends, to the new consultants' contract that we have successfully negotiated with the British Medical Association. Most Labour Members got the strong sense that he and the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) would have liked the negotiations to fail, so that there would be a row. They would have much preferred that outcome.

Mr. Burns: For the benefit of the debate, the Minister should not try to put words that we have never uttered into our mouths.

Mr. Hutton: Oh dear, there is some sensitivity there, and that is a strange observation to make. The hon. Gentleman talked about the new contract deterring new consultants from joining the NHS, but that is certainly not the view of the BMA, which warmly and strongly endorses it. It is a good deal for the NHS and for patients. Many hon. Members referred to the fact that there was give and take in the negotiations. Of course there was; they were negotiations. The contract will ensure that we have the opportunity to make the maximum use of the skills and talents of new consultants who join the NHS.

The hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) referred to the working time directive. She needs to have a look at it, because she does not understand how it works in relation to the 48-hour maximum week. I shall arrange for a copy to be sent to her.

The hon. Member for Southend, West referred to Southend hospital. I am delighted that he is doing a shift—

Mr. Amess: At 6.50 am.

Mr. Hutton: Indeed. It is fantastic that the hon. Gentleman is shadowing nurses. Southend has a great hospital. My mother and two of my sisters worked for long periods there.

[Mr. Hutton]

My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) spoke about the problems in his constituency, which he, I and everyone else know about. I will be happy if he wants to discuss the issue of capacity with me in more detail, and to bring a delegation down from Carlisle. I am grateful for the support that he has shown for the staff of the hospital in Carlisle. He is an eloquent champion of his constituency.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) mentioned bed definitions. In this place one has to be accountable for all sorts of weird and wonderful subjects, and I am happy to enter into correspondence on that if he would find it helpful. We always try to be consistent, so that we are all clear about what is and is not counted. That is important in the evidence that we provide to members of the Select Committee. If the Committee itself has any concerns on the subject, we stand ready to help it.

I agreed with virtually everything that my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) said. Perhaps that is no surprise to her, but she made a good speech. I was especially impressed by her approach to PFI. She described herself as a critic of and cynic about the benefits of PFI, and has considered the arguments with an open mind, which is important.

I do not want to say much about my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North because he is not here to respond to my remarks, and he would not like them. On the basis of his remarks, I do not think that he understands the PFI process. He made one comment about PFI partners being able simply to hike up the instalments. That is completely untrue. They are fixed at the beginning and cannot be changed other than by agreement. He completely misunderstands the process, as do other hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Romsey and the hon. Member for Wyre Forest. They turn a blind eye when it suits them to inconvenient evidence about value for money and PFI, and that does not advance the debate.

I welcomed the approach of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) and his support for our partnership work with the private sector in improving health services. He asked me specifically about the future of Mount Vernon. There are no plans to close Mount Vernon hospital and I hope that that is of comfort to him. He will be aware that Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire strategic health authority is reviewing the provision of acute services in that area, including the cancer services provided at Mount Vernon. The strategic health authority is to prepare a short list of options in a discussion paper to be published in the autumn, and more formal public consultation will take place early next year. The strategic health authority is committed to engaging the public in that consultation process, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will want to take part in it

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West made a number of telling points. I agree with his overall view of the report. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West was right to emphasise the importance of good management in the PFI process. As we tried to make clear in our response to the Select Committee's report, we are taking action within the Department and across the NHS to strengthen the management of PFI. There is always a risk in such projects—they are major capital projects. It might be transferred to the private sector through this process, but the NHS still has a critical role to play in ensuring that PFI delivers what we want—new hospitals, on time, providing the right environment in which to treat patients. He was right, and so was the Select Committee, to identify that we have a problem with project management expertise in the NHS. With every PFI project we reinvent the wheel. That is not good. Several such schemes are now in place, and we are beginning to put together a considerable amount of expertise in managing PFI. We must not squander it.

On pay beds, my hon. Friend and many other hon. Members have referred to recommendation (c) in the Select Committee report. I hope that he and others are satisfied with the Government's response. He also mentioned the ratio of single beds in new hospital schemes. The figure that he quoted—50 per cent.—is for guidance; it is not compulsory. It is important to increase the number of single beds because that is a practical and tangible way of enhancing privacy and dignity. We have had a lot of debate about the relationship of the NHS with the private sector. I would like more NHS hospitals to resemble in quality and standard the private hospitals that we are using for the benefit of the NHS. That is our ambition.

Jim Dowd: I accept that we should aspire to those standards. However, the fear is that we shall merely see beds being replaced with new beds, rather than with the perfect model of what should go there. In Lewisham, for example, the scheme might founder on this, yet it would mean that we could get rid of old Nightingale wards dating back to the 19th century and mixed sex wards. The balance needs to be made in the round.

Mr. Hutton: My hon. Friend speaks a great deal of common sense. We should all like to build utopia tomorrow in the NHS, but that is not possible. We need to approach the task of re-equipping the NHS with new hospitals for the current century in a sensible way. We should like to do all sorts of things and we must continue to push for them—increasing the ratio of single beds in new hospitals is an important long-term project.

The hon. Member for Romsey said that the jury was still out on PFI. I know that that is the view of many here, including my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield, and I have every respect for that view. I genuinely look forward to the time when I get letters from Liberal Democrat Members urging me not to proceed with PFI hospitals in their constituencies because they think that the jury is still out. I have a fairly strong suspicion that I shall not receive such letters soon.

The hon. Lady also expressed concern about staff drifting away from the national health service. There is absolutely no evidence whatsoever for that assertion. In fact, the NHS now has more doctors, nurses, therapists, cooks, cleaners and porters than it has ever had. In particular, there are now 31,500 more nurses working in the NHS than in 1997. I agree that there are still pressures in the system. For example, historically, in London and the south-east, there has been high use of agency staff, which we need to reduce, but that is the aim of the NHS professionals scheme. To hold out the spectre of staff drifting away is not a sensible contribution to the debate because it simply is not happening.

In talking about nurses, the hon. Member for West Chelmsford mentioned the need to create incentives for good performance, and he was anxious that nurses should not be left out of the process of pay modernisation. We are reviewing the contracts of GPs and modernising consultants' contracts. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the agenda for change negotiations, which started with non-pay review body staff, but also with nurses back in 1999, have now moved on to detailed negotiations about all these issues. The hon. Member for Romsey asked about equal pay for work of equal value. That will be a fundamental building platform for the agenda for change negotiations. We do not want to leave nurses out of the programme of pay modernisation.

Mr. Burns: I am grateful for that answer, but what about cost-of-living supplements and grade C nurses?

Mr. Hutton: I apologise. I did make a note of the hon. Gentleman's comments, but in my hurry to move on to what is now clearly not a deliverable speech, I overlooked that question.

We introduced cost-of-living supplements two years ago specifically to deal with growing labour market issues and high cost-of-living problems predominantly in London and the south-east. Cost-of-living and premium pay issues must be dealt with as part of the new agenda for change negotiations and discussions with NHS trade unions. I imagine that cost-of-living supplements will form part of the negotiations on the new pay structure for the NHS. It will be some time before the new system is introduced, and we will want to keep a close eye on cost-of-living supplements between now and then to examine the case for extending them to a wider group of staff. However, such decisions must focus on difficulties relating to recruitment and retention. If the hon. Member for West Chelmsford wants to raise with me his concerns about grade C nurses in his constituency, I shall be happy to discuss the matter with him.

I do not want to repeat arguments that have already been made about the future of our relationship with the private sector, but I shall deal with some more specific points. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield was concerned about whether reference costs provide a sufficient measure of value for money in the NHS. We accept that they do not, and we have tried to set out in our report several ways in which we can strengthen reference cost data. However, as we tried to emphasise in our response, they provide helpful management information. We have set out at least three ways in which we can make improvements. The NHS costings manual has been revised. Reference costs have been considered in relation to the district audit process, and there is now a new verification process.

My hon. Friend also referred to the evidence that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave to the Committee. He set out four essential tests that we apply to each prospective partnership in the NHS and private sector. Is it in the interests of patients? Is it consistent with the local and national strategies of the NHS? Is it value for money? Is it consistent with public sector values, including that treatment is determined by clinical need and staff are treated fairly? Those are the yardsticks by which we will judge and develop our relationship with the private sector. Provided that those tests are satisfied, we should use the private and voluntary sector where it has a track record of achievement or where it can offer clear potential gains. In its report, the Committee has done something very important, in making it clear—as did my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West—that the question is not whether the NHS should have a relationship with the independent sector but on what terms that relationship should be conducted and what the benefits are for NHS patients in terms of fast, high-quality treatment and value for money. Those are issues of joint concern for the Committee and the Government.

Of course the public sector has a well-established ability to provide many services to high standards. That has never been at issue, but it does not have sole expertise—

It being half-past Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 388

SESSION 2001–2002

1st July—12th July 2002

Printed indexes to Hansard

The volume index is one of three printed indexes to Commons Hansard produced from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS). It contains references to material in the bound volumes of Hansard. The other indexes produced are:

- The fortnightly index to Hansard. This covers the same date range as the volume index but references are to the column numbering in the daily parts and weekly edition of Hansard.
- The sessional index to Hansard. This contains references to material in the bound volumes for a whole session.

Indexes on the Parliamentary website

Fortnightly, volume and sessional indexes covering material from the beginning of the 1999/2000 session will also appear on the Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk with links to the full text of Hansard.

SCOPE

The indexes include entries covering:

- The content of all material recorded in Hansard, including debates, procedural motions and questions.
- The names of all Members contributing to the Parliamentary business recorded in Hansard.
- The names of some types of Parliamentary business whenever they occur in Hansard. These are 'Ministerial statements', 'Business statements', 'Opposition days' and 'Estimates days'.

ARRANGEMENT

- All headings are in one word-by-word alphabetical sequence, with Members' contribution entries distinguished from other entries by italics.
- Where a Member contributes to Parliamentary business and is the subject of Parliamentary business there are separate contribution and subject entries, the subject entry coming first.
- Entries beginning 'Mac' and 'Mc' are sorted in one sequence as 'Mac'.
- 'St', when abbreviated for Saint, is filed as 'Saint'.
- Numbers are filed as if spelt out, e.g. '10 Downing Street' as if 'Ten Downing Street'.

HEADINGS

Choice of headings

- Specificity—Entries summarise the overall content of a debate or question as specifically as the various POLIS thesauruses allow. For example, Education, Higher education, Universities or the name of a particular university is used depending on the breadth of the item.
- Name headings—Specific entries are included for the names of people, places, institutions, organisations, committees, programmes, initiatives, publications and legislation when these constitute the overall subject of an item.
- Organisations and subjects—Organisation entries are preferred for material about the general performance, administration and staffing of an organisation (for example, United Kingdom Passports Agency, Standards). Subject entries are preferred for what organisations do as part of their duties (for example, Passports, Fees and charges).

Geographical coverage

- Subject headings—Subject headings are assumed to refer to the whole of England, Great Britain or the United Kingdom unless otherwise stated.
- Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—Material relating to the whole of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is indexed under these headings.
- Places within the UK—Material about specific towns, areas and institutions is entered under the name of the specific town, area or institution.
- Foreign countries—Most material relating to foreign countries is collected under the name of that country. Some additional material may be found under the names of—groups of countries, areas within countries, geographical features, place names associated with particular issues, politicians and heads of state, international bodies, and institutions and companies operating in those countries.
- EC/EU material—General material about the European Communities and European institutions as bodies is entered under 'European Communities' and 'EC institutions'. Organisational material about specific communities and institutions is entered under the name of the body, for example 'European Coal and Steel Community' or 'European Parliament'. Material about what the Communities and institutions are doing or propose to do is entered under various subject headings beginning 'EC' such as 'EC environmental policy'.

Parliamentary material and business

- Material about Parliament—This is indexed under 'Parliament', the names of the two Houses, the 'Palace of Westminster' and parts of the Parliamentary estate (such as 'Portcullis House').
- Committees—Material about committees is indexed under 'Committees', types of committee (such as 'Select committees') and the names of individual committees (such as 'Home Affairs Select Committee').
- Parliamentary proceedings/procedures—Material discussing these is indexed under the specific type of proceeding (such as 'Parliamentary questions' or 'Oral questions'), procedure (such as 'Calling of Members') or issue (such as 'Unparliamentary expressions').
- Legislation—Entries for Parliamentary proceedings on bills and statutory instruments are entered under their titles, Where the lead word of the bill or statutory instrument does not provide a full or clear indication of the subject there are additional subject entries when the bill or instrument is debated. For example, debates on the 'Child Support Pensions and Social Security Bill' have entries under 'Pensions' and 'Social security benefits' as well as under the title of the Bill.
- Members' names—These are given in the form by which the Member prefers to be known.
- Speaker and Chair—Contributions by the Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Contributions from the chair during Committees of the Whole House are brought together under 'Chairman of Committee of the Whole House'. Significant rulings and statements (as opposed to routine comments) are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements' in both cases.

Guidance on headings

- Cross references—'See' references indicate all the material has been entered under another heading. 'See also' references indicate that additional information may be found under another heading.
- Concept thesaurus—A copy of the subject thesaurus to POLIS, listing the concept entries used in the index, is available on the Parliamentary website. A hard copy is available from the Head of the POLIS Unit, House of Commons Library, 1 Derby Gate, London, SW1A 2DG (020 7219 6456).

REFERENCES

- References in the indexes are to columns rather than pages.
- References to debates, but not questions, are accompanied by the date of the item.
- There are separate sequences in Hansard for the material taken on the floor of the House, Westminster Hall sittings and written questions:
  - References consisting of a number by itself indicate material taken on the floor of the House.
  - References ending in 'wh' indicate Westminster Hall sittings.
  - References ending in 'w' indicate written questions.
- References under all headings except the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in one numerical sequence irrespective of whether the material is taken on the floor of the House, is discussed at a Westminster Hall sitting or is a written question.
- References under the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in numerical sequence under the following headings:
  - Debates etc. (which includes interventions and points of order as well as significant contributions to debates);
  - Sittings in Westminster Hall (covering all debates held as part of the Westminster Hall sittings); and
  - Questions (which includes written, oral and private notice questions).

ABBREVIATIONS

The following abbreviations are used in connection with the progress of bills:

- 1R=First reading
- 2R=Second reading
- Com=Committee stage
- Rep=Report stage
- 3R=Third reading
- res=resolution
- amendt(s)=amendment(s)
- *=matter taken formally without debate or division.

Parliamentary background

- The Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk contains a range of information about Parliament and the full text of some Parliamentary papers and proceedings including Hansard.
- Information on current Parliamentary business is provided in the House of Commons Information Office Weekly Information Bulletin, available on the website and from The Stationery Office (020 7873 8499).
- Further information on Parliamentary proceedings and procedures is available from the House of Commons Information Office (020 7219 4272).

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Medical/Dental Education

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether undergraduate and postgraduate medical and dental education programmes include infection control and anti-microbial prescribing. [60790]

Margaret Hodge: Infection control and anti-microbial prescribing are included in the undergraduate and postgraduate medical and dental education programmes in England, in line with the requirements of the competent authorities.

Higher Education Students

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of applicants for higher education places have come from low income families in each year since 1997. [60252]

Margaret Hodge: Information on applicants to full-time undergraduate courses in higher education is collected by the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS). UCAS does not collect any specific information about family income but rather assigns social class to applicants based upon the occupation of the parent with the highest income in the applicants household, as reported by the potential student. For applicants aged 21 or over, the occupation of the person contributing the highest income to the household is used.

UCAS data on people applying to enter higher education in 1997 to 2001 are shown in the table.

Percentage of home applicants to full-time and sandwich undergraduate courses by social class

	Higher social class[1]	Lower social class[2]
1997	71	29
1998	71	29
1999	71	29
2000	71	29
2001	71	29

[1] Covers professional, intermediate and skilled (non-manual) social classes.

[2] Covers skilled (manual), partly skilled and unskilled social classes.

The Government are committed to raising the participation rates for people from less affluent family backgrounds, and has introduced Excellence Challenge, including the AimHigher campaign, which is targeted at raising attainment and aspirations among young people who traditionally would not consider going to university.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will list the higher education institutions showing the proportion of undergraduate students of each social class. [60254]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 10 June 2002]: The information requested has been placed in the Libraries.

Further Education

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what levels of funding for Further Education will be given to Bridgwater College and Carrington College in the years (a) 2002–03 and (b) 2003–04. [65147]

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the total budget is for Somerset in further education for (a) 2002–03 and (b) 2003–04. [65146]

Margaret Hodge: This is a matter for the Learning and Skills Council. I have therefore asked John Harwood, the Council's Chief Executive, to write to the hon. Member with the information requested and to place a copy of his reply in the Library.

Higher Education Funding Council

Sir Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will make a statement on the composition of the Higher Education Funding Council for England's settlement for the next financial year; and if she will calculate the current unit of funding per student in comparison with that apportioned in 1997. [65207]

Margaret Hodge: Publicly planned funding for higher education in 2003–04 was set out in the grant letter to the Higher Education Funding Council for England issued in November 2001:

Recurrent Funding—£5,650 million

Capital—£364 million

Access and Hardship—£115 million.

These figures may be amended following the outcome of the 2002 Spending Review. Publicly planned funding per full time equivalent student is set out at Table 4.8 of the Department's Annual Report for 2002. It shows a planned real terms value of £4,920 in 2003–04, compared to £4,910 in 1997–98.

Capital Requirements (Higher and Further Education)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment she has (a) made and (b) commissioned of the capital requirements of (i) the higher education and (ii) the further education sectors. [64292]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The capital requirements of the higher and further education sectors are part of the confidential advice offered to my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills by the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) and the Learning and Skills Council (LSC). This advice has been informed by a number of reviews, including a review of the higher education estate by the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors; a report by J. M. Consulting "Teaching and Learning Infrastructure in Higher Education" (HEFCE publication 2002/31); by a further review by J. M. Consulting, published in March 2002, reporting on investment in university research infrastructure, and by ongoing studies commissioned to examine Estate Management Statistics and compliance with the requirements of the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act in Further Education.

Fee-paying Students

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what progress has been made towards meeting the targets for the recruitment of international fee-paying students in the higher education and further education sectors under the Prime Minister's initiative; and what value has accrued to the United Kingdom economy from the campaign so far. [64680]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Our targets are to attract 25,000 extra further education students and 50,000 extra higher education students from outside the EU by 2005 (compared to 1996–97). Based on actual figures for England, Northern Ireland and Scotland and an estimate for Wales, 46,609 students from non-EU countries took full-time courses at further education colleges in the UK in 2000–01, compared to 25,102 in 1996–97 The extra 21,500 students made an estimated fee and non-fee contribution to the UK economy in 2000–01 in the region of £215 million. The non-EU total for international students in full-time UK higher education has risen to 140,905 for 2001–02, compared to 109,940 in 1996–97. For 2001–02, the additional 30,965 students make an estimated fee and non-fee contribution to the UK economy broadly in the region of £480 million.

Departmental Expenditure Limit

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much and what proportion of the departmental expenditure limit for 2002–03 had been spent by 31 May; what the figures were for 2001–02; and if she will make a statement. [61014]

Estelle Morris: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 June 2002, Official Report, column 130W.

Language Teaching

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if the Government intend to improve provision for teaching (a) Spanish and (b) Mandarin at (i) pre-16 and (ii) post-16 level. [62462]

Mr. Ivan Lewis [holding answer 18 June 2002]: The National Curriculum requires schools to offer at least one of the working languages of the European Union. Only when they have met this requirement may they offer non-European languages.

The Key Stage 3 National Strategy aims to achieve higher standards, good continuity, greater motivation and better learning in all subjects learnt by 11 to 14-year-olds, including modern foreign languages.

The Learning and Skills Council takes account of national, regional and local needs in deciding how to plan and fund all post-16 (excluding HE) modern foreign language learning. It is for individual universities and colleges to decide which subjects and courses they offer students, in the light of student demand.

The Government will publish their national languages strategy in the autumn which will outline their plans for improving the language capability of people of all ages.

Examination Marking

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what research has been undertaken by her to examine the quality and consistency of marking in public examinations. [63166]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The awarding bodies' arrangements for marking in public examinations are governed by a Code of Practice which is designed to ensure that standards are consistent within and across awarding bodies and over time. The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority (QCA) is responsible for monitoring compliance with the Code of Practice. QCA conducts scrutinies in a range of subjects each year covering GCSE, GCE, VCE, and GNVQ qualifications. QCA publishes reports on its websites including reports on standards over time.

In 2000, the QCA set up an independent panel of advisers to review the adequacy of its quality assurance systems designed to maintain A-level standards. The panel reported to QCA early in 2002 with a firm endorsement of its quality assurance systems.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what statistics she collates on the number of students who have lost or had to postpone university places because the results of re-marked exam scripts arrived too late for consideration. [63176]

Margaret Hodge: This information is not collected centrally.

Teachers

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) part-time and (b) full-time teachers in maintained schools, broken down by age, moved between Government office regions in the last 12 months. [64103]

Mr. Miliband: The numbers of teachers in regular full-or part-time service in the maintained schools sector in England at 31 March 1999 and 31 March 2000 who moved between Government office regions are listed as follows. (This is the most recent year for which provisional data are available.) The numbers do not include teachers moving between full-time and part-time service within the maintained schools sector, or those who moved out of regular service in the maintained schools sector in England.

Under 25	280	10
25 to 29	2,000	50
30 to 34	1,140	70
35 to 39	630	70

50 to 54	240	40
55 to 59	40	20
60 and over	10	10
Total	5,280	350

Some 10 per cent. to 20 per cent. of part-timers are not recorded on the Teachers' Pensions Scheme, from which the data are obtained.

Figures may not add to totals due to rounding. Age is at 31 March 2000.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) part-time and (b) full-time qualified teachers (i) left and (ii) joined maintained schools broken down by (A) age, (B) gender and (C) type of authority in each Government office region in the last 12 months. [64104]

Mr. Miliband: The numbers of teachers (i) leaving and (ii) joining regular full- or part-time service in the maintained schools sector in England between 31 March 1999 and 31 March 2000 are shown in the table. The numbers do not include teachers moving between full- and part-time service within the maintained schools sector, or moving between regular service in a maintained school in one Government office region to regular service in a maintained school in another Government office region.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers who were trained in (a) London and (b) other Government office regions took their first teacher post in the capital in the last 12 months. [64108]

Mr. Miliband: The provisional numbers of Initial Teacher Training completers in calendar year 1999 who were in full or part time service in the maintained schools sector in the London Government Office Region at 31 March 2000 were as follows:

Regions of ITT	Numbers
London	1,870
North East	30
North West	130
Yorkshire and The Humber	80
East Midlands	90
West Midlands	70
East of England	190
South East	230
South West	140
OU and SCITT	30
England	2,880

The numbers shown as in service may increase as a result of late receipt of annual service returns. This is the most recent available information.

Some 10 per cent. to 20 per cent. of part-timers are not recorded on the Teachers' Pension Scheme, from which the data are obtained.

This information was published in the Statistical of Education volume Teachers in England (including teachers pay for England and Wales) 2001 edition, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans she has to identify teacher shortages in schools for the beginning of the next academic year. [64553]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 26 June 2002]: The Department for Education and Skills (DfES) is in regular contact with Local Education Authorities, notably Recruitment Strategy Managers, to share information regarding any teacher shortages.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will identify by (a) geographical area and (b) subject specialisation, where there is difficulty recruiting and/or retaining teachers. [64554]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 26 June 2002]: There were 9,400 full-time equivalent more regular teachers in schools in January 2002 (provisional) than a year before. The following Table 9 shows the latest provisional teacher vacancy rates by Government office region, which reflect turnover between schools as well as indicating schools' requirements for new teachers. The table was published in SFR 05/2002 on 24 April.

The following Table 10, also from SFR 05/2002, shows vacancy rates by subject for classroom teachers in maintained secondary schools.

Individual schools may find recruitment and retention easier or more difficult in particular subjects depending on their particular circumstances, including geographical location, but such information is not collected centrally.

[2] Teachers in post include full-time regular teachers in (or on secondment from) maintained secondary schools, plus the secondary portion of full-time divided service, peripatetic, advisory and miscellaneous teachers.

[3] The number of teachers in post by main teaching subject is estimated using the 1992 Secondary School Staffing Survey for years 1996 and 1997 (old) and the 1996 Secondary School Curriculum and Staffing Survey for 1997 (new), 1998, 1999, 2000 and 2001.

[5] Vacancies advertised in single sciences may be combined science classes. The distinction between single science vacancy rates and combined science has been discontinued for 1998. Corresponding figures on the old and new basis are shown for 1997.

[6] Special Educational Needs has been included in 'other, main and combined subjects' from 1997 (new).

School Fire Safety

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the estimated cost is of damage caused by fires at schools for each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if she will make a statement. [64303]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Department does not collect this information.

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will estimate how many schools have been fitted with fire sprinkler systems; what percentage of schools this represents; and if she will make a statement. [64302]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Department does not collect data on fire sprinkler systems.

If a fire should happen in a school, the Department's primary concern is the safety of pupils, teachers and other users. Regulation 17 of the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1999 requires that every part of a school building, and of the land provided for a school, shall be such that the safe escape of the occupants in case of fire is reasonably assured. Schools are also covered by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, and subsequent regulations. These include aspects of fire safety.

To help schools manage fire safety, the Department published Managing School Facilities Guide 6, "Fire Safety", in 2000. This offers guidance on how to minimise the risk of fire, including identifying hazards and carrying out risk assessments. It also gives advice on training and on fire detection and alarm systems.

Pupil:teacher Ratios (Suffolk)

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the average pupil:teacher ratio was in Suffolk in each year between 1997 and 2002 in (a) primary, (b) middle and (c) upper schools. [64390]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested is shown in the table.

Average pupil:teacher ratio[1] in maintained primary, middle[2] and secondary schools in Suffolk LEA
Position in January each year

	Total Primary	Secondary	Middle deemed Secondary	Total Secondary
2002[3]	21.6	16.3	18.4	16.9
2001	22.0	16.4	18.7	17.1
2000	22.1	16.0	18.9	16.9
1999	22.0	15.7	18.9	16.6
1998	22.2	15.5	18.8	16.5
1997	22.3	15.6	18.8	16.6

[1] The pupil:teacher ratio within schools is the ratio of full-time equivalent pupils to full-time equivalent number of teachers.

[2] There are no middle deemed primary schools in Suffolk.

Education SSA

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which local education authorities (a) spent and (b) proposed to spend less than SSA on education, showing the extent of the shortfalls, in each of the years 1999–2000 to 2002–03. [63889]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested has been placed in the Libraries.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which local education authorities failed to passport increases in education SSA; and what the extent of the shortfall was in each of the years 1999–2000 to 2002–03. [63890]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 24 June 2002]: The names of the local education authorities which failed to passport increases in the education SSA were published in the LEAs' Local Schools Budgets Comparative Tables for each of the years 1999–2000 to 2002–03.

The information requested is listed by each of the years in question.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of education SSA was included in schools' delegated budgets in each local education authority in each year since 1999–2000, ranked by order of the most recent year. [63891]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 24 June 2002]: The following table shows schools' delegated budgets as a proportion of education SSA. These percentages differ from the delegation percentages published annually by the Department. Those percentages are based on the Local Schools Budget (LSB), the coverage of which differs significantly from the coverage of the Education SSA: in particular, the LSB includes expenditure financed by the Standards Fund and other specific grants, but excludes expenditure on non-school education. The percentages shown below will reflect LEAs' spending levels relative to their SSAs as well as their propensity to delegate within the LSB, and will also be affected, year to year, by changes in the scope of the SSA.

Notes

Schools delegated budgets comprise the Individual Schools' Budget excluding the School Standards Grant (which does not form part of the SSA) as taken from LEAs Section 52 budget statements returned to the DfES each year.

Education SSA figures are as per settlement rounds for each year.

LearnDirect Plus

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many people have enrolled on LearnDirect plus in the Portsmouth, South constituency since it began; how many courses are provided in Portsmouth, South; how much funding has been provided for these courses; and if he will make a statement. [64728]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: 5,010 people have enrolled on a LearnDirect course in the Portsmouth, South constituency since the initiative was rolled out in October 2000. Learners in Portsmouth, South can choose from the current LearnDirect portfolio of 647 courses, which can be accessed at a LearnDirect centre or at home, at work or other locations. We are unable to provide information on the amount of funding provided for courses in the Portsmouth, South constituency.

Apprenticeships

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) modern apprenticeship and (b) advanced modern apprenticeship starts there were in the Portsmouth, South constituency in each of the last three years; and if she will make a statement. [65370]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The numbers of advanced modern apprenticeships and foundation modern apprenticeships, started by people recorded as living in the Portsmouth, South constituency, in each of the last three years. are as follows.

	Advanced modern apprenticeships	Foundation modern apprenticeships
2001–02[1]	61	148

[1] Figures for 1999–00 and 2000–01 include transfers onto AMA and FMA from other Work-Based Learning. Figures for 2001–02 do not include these transfers.

Work Experience

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what her plans are for providing further work experience for teenagers of school age. [63390]

Mr. Miliband: Over 95 per cent. of school pupils already undertake work experience placements in their last years of compulsory schooling to help develop the skills and attitudes essential for the world of work. The Department provides £10 million a year towards the costs of this programme, and evaluations suggest that the placements are generally satisfactory and well-received by schools, pupils and employers. We will also fund a £38 million programme over 2002–2004 to expand vocational opportunities at Key Stage 4. This includes support for over 30,000 pupils on part-time vocational courses in colleges that will often involve direct experience of the world of work.

The Green Paper "14–19: extending opportunities, raising standards", published in February, proposes that all young people should undertake some work-related learning. Plans to develop and enhance existing arrangements for work experience will depend upon decisions yet to be taken on these proposals.

St. Benedict's Catholic High School

Dr. Jack Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when she expects to announce a decision on the application of St. Benedict's Catholic High School, Whitehaven for engineering college status; and if she will make a statement. [64854]

Mr. Miliband: We plan to announce the names of the schools, following the March competition, which have been successful in meeting the criteria for Specialist School designation, on Thursday 4 July. This will include the first designations under the new specialisms, which include Engineering Colleges.

Welsh A-level

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will ensure that UK universities in receipt of state funding accept Welsh A-level as a valid qualification for entry. [65391]

Margaret Hodge: Higher education institutions throughout the UK are autonomous institutions. Therefore the acceptance or non-acceptance of A-level Welsh as an appropriate entry qualification would be a decision for each individual higher education institution to take in the light of the course which the applicant wished to pursue, and the applicant's other qualifications. I am not aware of any institutions with a blanket policy of not accepting A-level Welsh.

School Visits

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will list the schools visited by senior officials in her Department, broken down by (a) local education authority and (b) dates, since 1997; and how many schools have been visited by officials in her Department each year since 1997. [65578]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: Detailed information on school visits by senior officials and other staff in the Department is not available, but many such visits are undertaken each year. All staff in the Department are encouraged to visit schools and experience for themselves the impact our policies have and to take back the views of teachers, governors and parents. We are currently running, in conjunction with the Secondary Heads Association, a special programme which over the next year will involve all middle managers in Schools Directorate spending three days immersed in the life of a secondary school.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will list the schools visited by Ministers in her Department, broken down by (a) local education authority, (b) dates and (c) Ministers, since 1997. [65577]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The information in the form requested is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Leonardo Da Vinci Programme

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will make a statement on the reason for the delay in the payment of Leonardo da Vinci monthly programme grants by the UK Leonardo Unit. [63686]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 21 June 2002]: The Agencies which administer the Leonardo da Vinci programme in the UK on behalf of the Department for Education and Skills have not been able to enter into formal contracts for 2002 projects because of delays in agreeing contracts with and receiving funding from the European Commission. I understand that funding should be available soon and I hope that this will enable contracts to be agreed and payments made for specific projects shortly afterwards.

National Insurance

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will calculate in percentage terms the increase in costs to local education authorities and schools of the introduction of the new rates of employers national insurance. [65534]

Estelle Morris: The additional cost in employers' national insurance contributions in 2003–04 for English local education authorities and schools represents 0.5 per cent. of total planned spending in that year. I refer the hon. Member to the reply to the Question from the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), 24 April 2002, Official Report, column 311W.

Investors in People

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans she has to announce the result of the quinquennial review of Investors in People UK. [66163]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The first stage of the quinquennial review of Investors in People UK has been completed. A report has been published today, outlining the findings of the review and the recommendations that have been made as a result. The report is available in the Library. It can also be seen on the DfES website: "www.dfes.gov.uk/consultations".

Carlton House Terrace

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what funding is given to organisations to meet the cost of property in Carlton House Terrace. [63485]

Margaret Hodge: The only organisation occupying premises in Carlton House Terrace that is funded by this Department is the British Academy. The British Academy's Grant-in-Aid for 2002–03 is £13 million, including administrative and premises costs.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Solicitor-General if she will make a statement on how each CPS region is improving its own performance management. [60216]

The Solicitor-General: The devolved 42 area structure of the CPS empowers Chief Crown Prosecutors and their area business managers to develop their own approach to performance management, both internally within the organisation and in partnership with their local criminal justice partners. All areas have an annual business plan and conduct a follow-up review of their performance against those plans. To maintain consistent standards, and in order to compare and contrast performance across the service nationally, all areas report performance across a range of indicators within a national framework that supports the business planning process.

In addition, area performance is reviewed independently by the CPS inspectorate.

Acquittals

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Solicitor-General what analysis she has undertaken to determine the reasons for (a) judge-ordered and (b) judge-directed acquittals. [60202]

The Solicitor-General: I regularly receive reports from the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS), who maintain a record of the number of cases resulting in a judge-ordered or directed acquittal and capture a broad analysis of the reasons underlying the failure of the case.

The figures shown in the table contain an analysis for the year ending March 2002. The figures in column one represent the number of defendants whose case resulted in a judge-ordered or judge-directed acquittal together with the reasons for the outcome. The figures in column two express these as a percentage of completed Crown Court cases (not including cases dealt with under its appellate jurisdiction).

In the year 2001–02 a judges-ordered or directed acquittal in 13,306 cases, representing 15.8 per cent. of the total. Of these, the largest figure (4,515 cases) represents cases where a judge ordered acquittal because a prosecution witness was missing, or refused to give evidence, where a complaint was withdrawn, or where a witness was unable to give evidence. This category accounts for 5.4 per cent. of the total number of cases and 33.9 per cent. of the total number of judge-ordered and directed acquittals.

A further 3,078 (3.6 per cent. of the total) resulted in a judge-ordered acquittal because of doubts over the admissibility, reliability or strength of evidence (other than identification evidence).

A more detailed list of reasons for these outcomes will be available following the introduction of the CPS Compass Case Management System due to roll-out between April and December 2003.

Reasons for judge-ordered and judge-directed acquittals 2001–02

	Number of defendants[1]	Percentage of completed cases[2]
Judge-ordered acquittals
Witness missing/refuses or unable to give evidence/complaint withdrawn	4,515	5.4
Defendant medical problems	257	0.3
Other indictments or sentences	1,072	1.8
Doubts identification evidence	966	1.1
Other evidence inadmissible/unreliable/conflicting	3,078	3.6
Legal element missing from prosecution case	771	0.9
Long delay or abuse of process	565	0.7
Adjournment refused/P11 application refused	600	0.7
Total	11,824	14.0
Judge-directed acquittals
Identification evidence unreliable	271	0.3
Legal element missing from prosecution case	243	0.3
Doubts over other evidence	460	0.5
Confession or other evidence ruled inadmissible	38	0.0
Other reason	470	0.6
Total	1,482	1.8

[1] This column shows the number of defendants whose case resulted in judge-ordered and directed acquittal.

[2] This column expresses these figures as a percentage of completed Crown Court cases, excluding appeals and committals for sentence.

DEFENCE

Helicopter Equipment

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to install an integrated cockpit voice and flight data recorder with a health and usage monitoring system into (a) Sea King Mk 3, (b) Sea King Mk 3A, (c) Lynx and (d) Puma aircraft; at what stage these plans are; and if he will make a statement. [64850]

Mr. Ingram: We are examining how we can derive the maximum benefit for these in-service helicopters from integrated cockpit voice and flight data recorders, and the health and usage monitoring system. Final decisions have yet to be taken as to which helicopter types will be fitted with this equipment, and to what timescale.

Housing

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many military service properties in the United Kingdom are waiting to be sold. [54633]

Dr. Moonie: If "military service properties" refers to housing, most of the family quarters estate in England and Wales was sold to Annington Homes Ltd. (AHL) in November 1996. The sale to AHL did not cover Scotland. The Defence Housing Executive (DHE) leases back from AHL the properties it needs to house service families. Under the sale agreement, DHE must hand back 13,213 properties to AHL over the first 25 years (i.e. to 2021). In financial year 2001–02, 2,305 properties were released to AHL and a further 220 family quarters still owned by my Department were passed to Defence Estates (DE) for disposal.

To date in 2002, 1,884 leased properties in England and Wales have been handed back to AHL. On 31 March 2002 DE were actively preparing in excess of 600 houses for sale.

More generally, the number of sites (other than housing) in disposal changes from day to day as some are sold and others come forward for disposal.

Land Sales

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list land within the Defence Estates portfolio that (a) is being offered for sale and (b) will be offered in the next 12 months, giving its (i) location and (ii) size. [59068]

[1] Indicates land likely to be offered in the next 12 months, compared to land currently being offered.

It should be noted that these figures represent only a "snapshot" of the situation in regard to sites in disposal. Land is declared surplus and comes forward for disposal frequently, and sites are sold on a regular basis.

The list is also restricted to land, rather than buildings and thus does not constitute the totality of MOD sites in disposal.

Armed Forces Exercises

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the (a) date, (b) participating units, (c) timing, (d) nature of exercise and (e) total cost of exercise, were for each exercise involving British armed forces, originally planned for BATUS in Canada during this financial year; and if each exercise is still scheduled to take place. [62229]

Mr. Ingram: Details of British Army training exercises that are scheduled to take place in BATUS during this financial year along with their attendant costs are shown in the table. All the BATUS exercises scheduled for this financial year are still due to take place.

Dates/timings	Exercise	Participating units	Timings (prairie days)	Nature of exercise	Expected cost of exercise[1] (£ million)

[1] Costs are calculated by dividing the total BATUS resource consumption by the number of MEDICINE MAN Exercises. (Exercise IRON ANVIL equates to approximately 2 MEDICINE MAN exercises).

Medical Categories (Armed Forces)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2002, Official Report, column 181W, how many (a) women and (b) men in the (i) Army, (ii) Royal Navy and (iii) RAF are in a downgraded medical category; to which category they belong and the percentage of trained strength this represents; and if he will make a statement. [56171]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 15 May 2002]: The information requested is shown in the table. My answer of 8 May 2002, Official Report, column 181W, related to certain specified Army medical downgrading categories only. My answer of 10 June 2002, Official Report, column 732W, provided a list of the medical downgrading categories used by all three services.

Notes:

1. The figures are as at 1 May 2002.

2. Figures have been rounded to the nearest two decimal places. Those marked with an asterisk are 0.004 per cent. or less.

3. Army and RAF figures show medically downgraded trained personnel as a percentage of trained strength.

4. Naval figures show totally medically downgraded personnel, including new entry trainees, as a percentage of total strength as the Royal Navy is unable to provide separate figures for medically downgraded trained personnel only.

5. The Army PO category normally relates to personnel undergoing hospital treatment or on hospital sick leave, but may also include personnel for whom no PULHHEEMS employment standard is recorded on the personnel computer.

Army (Recruitment)

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many applications to join the Army in each year since 1998 were rejected with no reason given to the applicant; and in what circumstances the Department refuses to give reasons for rejection of applicants. [62640]

Mr. Ingram: No applications to join the Army are refused without a reason being given to the applicant. However, in common with other Government Departments, it is the Ministry of Defence's policy to maintain the freedom to accept, or reject, any person for employment without giving a detailed explanation.

Wind Farms (Scotland)

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those applications for wind farms in Scotland since January 2000 that his Department have (a) objected to and (b) not objected to. [64346]

Dr. Moonie: I will write to the hon. Member with a list of all wind farm proposals for Scotland received during the time specified and I will place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

The Ministry of Defence has received a total of 182 wind energy proposals in Scotland since 1 January 2000, of which 112 received no objection and 70 were objected to. The objections were for varying reasons of interference to low flying, radar or microwave links.

Meteor BVRAAM Missile Programme

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the projected contract schedule for the Meteor BVRAAM missile programme is; and if he will make a statement. [64282]

Dr. Moonie: A draft contract for the development and production of the Meteor (BVRAAM) missile was sent to our partner nations at the end of April. A number of amendments have now been incorporated into a final version, which was passed to our partners earlier this month. We very much hope that all partner nations will confirm within the next few weeks that they are content for the contract to be signed and that Germany will also sign the Meteor Memorandum of Understanding (already signed by the other five nations). Our aim remains to award the contract to MBDA in July.

Chinook Helicopter

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the decision was taken by his Department not to provide a full response to letters received on the subject of the fatal accident to Chinook ZD576. [64564]

Mr. Ingram: No such decision has been taken.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to whom the reasons for the two suspensions of RAF Chinook HC2 flight trials at Boscombe Down in 1994 were communicated at the time. [64562]

Mr. Ingram: The distribution of the aircraft and armament evaluation establishment, Boscombe Down's internal minutes communicating the reasons for the temporary suspension of flight trials included the Procurement Executive, the RAF Air Operations Branch and the Director of Flying, and our Liaison Officer in Philadelphia.

Annual Leave

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the average annual leave entitlement is for staff in his Department in 2002. [64641]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 6 March 2002, Official Report, column 314W. There have been no subsequent changes to Ministry of Defence leave entitlements.

Bell 412 Helicopter

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2002, Official Report, column 957W, on 84 Squadron, if the Bell 412 Enhanced Performance helicopter will be manned by RAF crews. [64824]

Mr. Ingram: Under current plans the Bell 412 helicopters will be part of an RAF unit and manned primarily by RAF crews.

Invincible Class Ships

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Invincible class ships are able to embark Harrier GR7 when the vessel is undertaking its LPH role. [64820]

Mr. Ingram: Invincible class ships can embark GR7 in the LPH role but would not usually be tasked to do so. In the LPH role the Carrier Air Group will consist of the helicopters required to lift a full Commando Group and would therefore be severely constrained for space in which to embark fixed wing aircraft at the same time.

Defence Logistics Organisation

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by how much the Defence Logistics Organisation overspent its original budget estimate in the last financial year; and how this deficit was funded. [64816]

Mr. Ingram: The estimates provision at the start of the 2001–02 financial year for the Defence Logistics Organisation (DLO) was made up of £3,412 million for current and £612 million for capital expenditure. As I explained in my replies of 26 October 2001, Official Report, columns 405–06W and 31 October 2001, Official Report, columns 659–60W, in the normal course of business there are adjustments to these limits as the year unfolds which were reflected in the spring supplementary estimates. The revised estimates for the DLO were £4,442 million for current and £1,105 million for capital expenditure. The DLO resource accounts are still being finalised but currently show the DLO has contained its expenditure within these revised limits.

Defence Export Services Organisation

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the duration is of the contract of the head of the Defence Export Services Organisation; and what his annual salary is in (a) 2001–02 and (b) 2002–03. [65267]

Dr. Moonie: The post of the Head of Defence Export Services (HDES) has been recently advertised as a 3-year contract, with the possibility of extension. The post is also offered as a secondment for the same duration.

A summary of the employment terms and conditions of the former HDES was submitted as written evidence to the March 1999 House of Commons Defence Committee Report on "The Appointment of the New Head of Defence Export Services". This indicates that the HDES salary for 2001–02 would fall within the Permanent Secretary pay band (£104,292-£179,022). The defence industries council then pays an additional element that would bring the salary to the level, which the individual would otherwise receive, in industry.

The HDES salary for 2002–03 will not be known until the current recruitment process has been completed (although the advertisement refers to an "attractive £ six figure package").

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence where the overseas offices of the Defence Export Services Organisation are situated; when each office was established; how many staff are employed; and what the cost for 2001–02 and 2002–03 is for each. [65265]

Dr. Moonie: Details of overseas offices of the Defence Export Services Organisation are as follows:

Country	Date established	Number of staff	Budget 2001–02 (£000)
Australia	1989	2	144.3
Brunei	1995	2	93.4
Germany	1991	4	153.7
Greece	2000	1	50.1
India[1]	1984	2	145.4
Kuwait[2]	1989	9	213.8
Malaysia	1986	4.5	169.8
Qatar	1998	2	85.1
Saudi Arabia[1]	1985	59	0
Singapore	2001	2	131.7
South Africa	2000	2	79.8
South Korea	1988	2	63.1
Turkey	1988	1	91.3
UAE	1999	1	88.1

[1] Staff currently withdrawn

[2] Four staff are employed by the Kuwait Programme Office and are funded by the customer government.

[3] 59 staff are employed on the Al-Yamamah programme and are funded by the customer government.

Note:

Figures for financial year 2002–03 have not been set.

In addition there are staff in the British embassies in Berlin, Paris and Washington DC who are responsible for a range of defence equipment issues, including defence exports.

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff are employed within the Defence Export Services Organisation broken down by job title; and how many of the staff are employed in London. [65264]

Dr. Moonie: There are currently 610 staff employed within the Ministry of Defence, Defence Export Services Organisation (DESO), with 402 personnel employed in London.

A breakdown of the figures is as follows:

DESO business area	Number of staff
Marketing support	136
Military support, exhibitions, protocol and training	114
Export control, policy and finance/personnel	47
Project management	[1]226
Disposal services	87
Total	[2]610

[1] Project office staff are paid for by the customer

[2] Full-time equivalent staff

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the budget for the (a) Defence Export Services Organisation and (b) the Infantry Export Support Team in (i) the past two years, (ii) the current year and (iii) future years for which estimates are available. [65268]

Dr. Moonie: The budgets for DESO (Defence Export Services Organisation) and the export Support Teams is presented in the table.

	DESO	Export Support Teams
2000–01	12.412	[1]1.920
2001–02	12.348	0.288
2002–03	14.251	0.366

[1] Figures for Infantry Support Team for 2000–01 cannot be separated from the overall figure for the Export Support Teams.

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of staff of the Defence Export Services Organisation are seconded from industry; and what functions they perform. [65266]

Dr. Moonie: There are currently no industry secondees working within the Defence Export Services Organisation.

Aircraft Carriers

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many days of operational capability per annum were achieved by aircraft carriers in each of the last five years; and how many days operational capability was specified for the two new carriers. [64800]

Mr. Ingram: The number of days of operational capability per annum achieved by the Royal Navy's Invincible-class aircraft carriers during the past five years was as follows:

	Days
1998	494
1999	426
2001	502

Operational requirements for the future carriers are still being developed. However, it is intended that at least one of the planned fleet of two ships will be operationally available at all times and ship availability will be comparable to that achieved for the existing three Invincible class carriers.

HMS Talent

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what savings will accrue from the withdrawal from operational service of HMS Talent ahead of her refit; and for what reasons HMS Talent has been laid up until her refit commences. [64818]

Mr. Ingram: HMS Talent reached her maximum permissible commission length in mid-June and has been laid-up prior to entering a long overhaul period in Devonport dockyard in spring 2003. The delay in starting the overhaul results from a need to profile the work load of Devonport dockyard efficiently, to deconflict with the refit of HMS Vanguard, and to balance available funds with more high priority competing demands. Few, if any, savings will accrue. The Royal Navy manpower released will be deployed elsewhere. Minor savings that might be realised from reduced operating costs will be offset by charges for essential services during the lay-up period.

Tanks

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what effects the implementation of whole fleet management will have on (a) the number of tanks in the British Army and (b) their state of readiness. [64815]

Mr. Ingram: The implementation of whole fleet management will have no effect on the number of tanks in the British Army. Operational analysis suggests that it should lead to an improvement in operational readiness.

Defence Attachés

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at how many British embassies defence attachés were stationed in each financial year since 1999–2000. [65269]

Dr. Moonie: The number of British embassies at which attachés were stationed in each financial year since 1999–2000 is as follows:

	Number
1999–2000	[1]71
2000–01	74
2001–02	[2]76
2002–03	81

[1] Increasing to 75 by October 2000 as a result of the attaché review

[2] Increasing to 80 by October 2001 as a result of the attaché review

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the functions of defence attachés, stating the percentage of time devoted to each function. [65272]

Dr. Moonie: As a result of the Strategic Defence Review, defence attachés and advisers have six core functions. The percentage of time devoted to each function is estimated as:

Support to defence diplomacy: 33 per cent.

Provision of operational military advice: 26 per cent.

Provision of politico-military advice: 7 per cent.

Support to Defence Intelligence: 5 per cent.

Support to Defence Exports: 11 per cent.

Representation and administrative support: 18 per cent.

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many defence attachés were employed by his Department in each financial year since 1999–2000. [65270]

Dr. Moonie: The number of defence attachés that were employed by the Ministry of Defence in each financial year since 1999–2000 is as follows.

Financial year	Number
1999–2000	118
2000–01	124
2001–02	126
2002–03	127

Ministerial Visits

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) overseas visits by Ministers in his Department and (b) visits to ministers in the United Kingdom by overseas Government Ministers and officials have taken place in each of the last three years in which United Kingdom arms sales were discussed. [65274]

Dr. Moonie: Defence Ministers regularly meet with their overseas counterparts and with other senior officials to discuss a range of defence matters, including defence export opportunities. Details of such discussions are not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Defence Exhibitions

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what costs were incurred by his Department in providing military land and personnel support to defence exhibitions in each financial year since 1999–2000. [65273]

Dr. Moonie: Assistance to exhibitions is provided from a wide range of departmental sources which contribute to a greater and lesser degree according to their responsibilities. The information requested is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Project Aquatrine

Clive Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of Project Aquatrine. [66236]

Dr. Moonie: Project Aquatrine will transfer the responsibility for the maintenance and operation of all the Ministry of Defence's water and wastewater assets and infrastructure in Great Britain to private sector providers.

There are three contracts for water and wastewater service provision. An initiation to negotiate for the first contract covering South West England and Wales was issued on 16 July 2001 and it is anticipated that a preferred bidder will be selected by the end of 2002.

Invitations to negotiate for the remaining two contracts covering Scotland and the North and East of England, to be issued to six bidders, on 3 July for the North and East of England contract and 10 July 2002 for the Scottish contract.

The consortia invited to negotiate for the Scotland contract are:

Brey Utilities;

Nevis Water—comprising Thames Water plc and Scottish Water; and

United Utilities/Morgan Est/Babtie Consortium.

The consortia invited to negotiate for the North and East of England:

Brey Utilities—comprising Yorkshire Water Services Limited, Earth Tech Engineering Limited, Halliburton Brown and Root Limited;

Diamond Alliance Ltd;

Thames Water plc; and

United Utilities/Morgan Est/Babtie Consortium.

It is anticipated that the preferred bidder for the Scottish and North and East England contracts will be announced in July 2003, with the contract expected to be awarded in October 2003, with go-live in April 2004.

Colchester Garrison

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about (a) the original projected cost and (b) the current estimated cost of the building of the new Colchester Garrison. [65759]

Mr. Ingram: The information requested is commercial in confidence, and, at this stage, is being withheld under Exemption 13 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

RAF Training

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the savings to the RAF would be if all subcontracted hours for initial training of pilots were transferred from the University Air Squadrons to private sector trainers. [65390]

Mr. Ingram: The University Air Squadrons already have significant private sector involvement with a contractor providing flying hours and support services. Significant savings arose from this contract and they will be quantified by the post project evaluation, which is due to be undertaken later this year. University Air Squadron instructors are RAF officers. We view it as an important element of training that trainee pilots have the benefit of a military environment and contact with military personnel.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many pilots trained by (a) the Joint Elementary Flying Training School at RAF Church Fenton and (b) University Air Squadrons have subsequently (i) joined the RAF and (ii) chosen not to do so in each of the past five years. [65392]

Mr. Ingram: All of the pilots trained by the Joint Elementary Flying Training School at Church Fenton are already members of the RAF.

In the case of the University Air Squadrons, the numbers are not immediately available and I will write to the hon. Member when the information has been gathered and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many flying hours the 15 University Air Squadrons were contracted to provide to the RAF during each of the years of their existing contract; and how many hours were delivered in each of these years. [65294]

Mr. Ingram: Flying hours, using the Tutor aircraft, are provided to the University Air Squadrons as part of the light aircraft flying task contract. Although this contract was let in April 1999, it was phased in with the last aircraft delivered in September 2001. Consequently, there is not yet a history of delivery of flying hours against the contract. The contract also provides flying hours to the Air Cadet Air Experience Flights and the Central Flying School at RAF Cranwell, to train instructions and also to conduct elementary navigator training. The contract provides 30,500 hours with an option to fly up to 50,000 hours. The additional hours are paid for only if used. In the year ending March 2002 just under 40,000 hours were flown.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to renew the contract of the Joint Elementary Flying Training School at RAF Church Fenton. [65389]

Mr. Ingram: The contract with Babcock HCS to provide Firefly aircraft and instructors for the Joint Elementary Flying Training School, which operates at RAF Barkston Heath, RAF Cranwell, RAF Church Fenton and the School of Army Aviation at Middle Wallop, ends on 7 July 2003. The cost effective means of meeting the Joint Elementary Flying Training School's requirement after this will be to absorb the RAF element of the task, which is undertaken at Church Fenton, into the University Air Squadrons, where the majority of RAF pilots are already trained. The balance of the task has been the subject of a competition and a contract will be let shortly.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Joint Elementary Flying Training School at RAF Church Fenton provided the contracted hours per year to the RAF during the existing contract. [65394]

Mr. Ingram: Yes.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the criteria used by his Department to evaluate the success of the Joint Elementary Flying Training School at RAF Church Fenton to train RAF pilots in the elementary stage of their flying career; and if he will make a statement. [65297]

Mr. Ingram: Success is judged by the output of students on time, to the required standard, and with a failure rate of less than 15 per cent. The School at Church Fenton has met these criteria.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the proposed saving to the RAF is if the Joint Elementary Flying Training School at RAF Church Fenton's contract for flying hours is returned to the university air squadrons. [65296]

Mr. Ingram: Significant annual savings are anticipated.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what criteria are used by the Department to evaluate the success of the 15 university air squadrons in training RAF pilots in the elementary stage of their flying careers; and whether comparative evaluation has been made with the Joint Elementary Flying Training School at RAF Church Fenton. [65388]

Mr. Ingram: Elementary flying training for members of University Air Squadrons is undertaken to a defined syllabus and output standard. A direct comparison of University Air Squadron trained and Joint Elementary Flying Training School trained RAF pilots is seen at the point of streaming to aircraft type (fast jet, rotary wing, or multi-engine), which follows immediately after elementary flying training. At this point, there is no discernible difference between them. Historically, a comparison of success rates through to the more difficult fast-jet front line has shown a small advantage for University Air Squadron trained students.

Afghanistan

Tony Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if serial numbers have been systematically logged in respect of the weapons found in Afghanistan since coalition military operations began against suspected Taliban and al-Qaeda forces earlier this year. [64685]

Mr. Hoon: The Royal Marines deployed in Afghanistan have discovered a number of significant weapons caches. Those weapons that have not been destroyed have been handed over to the Afghan authorities. There has been no routine logging of serial numbers.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Madagascar

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in Madagascar. [65002]

Mr. MacShane [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The Organisation of African Unity and President Wade of Senegal continue with their mediation efforts. The UK, along with EU partners and others in the donor community continues to encourage the two parties to find a solution through dialogue. The US has recently recognised Mark Ravalomanana as President of Madagascar.

European Parliamentary Investigations

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what protocols exist on the operation of European parliamentary investigations being conducted within the United Kingdom. [65006]

Peter Hain [holding answer 27 June 2002]: There is no protocol which governs the operations of European parliamentary investigations. Temporary committees of the European Parliament are set up under its rules of procedure. A Decision of the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission sets out the detailed provisions governing the European Parliament's right of inquiry and the setting up of temporary committees of inquiry.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the power members of the European Parliament have to summon witnesses for inquiries that they are conducting within the United Kingdom. [65007]

Peter Hain [holding answer 27 June. 2002]: Article 193 of the treaty on European Union provides for the setting up of temporary committees of inquiry.

Under the Decision of the European Parliament, Council, and the Commission on the exercise of the European Parliament's right of inquiry, temporary committees of inquiry may request member states to designate an "official or servant whom they authorise to appear before the temporary committee of inquiry, unless grounds of secrecy or public or national security dictate otherwise by virtue of national or Community legislation". This is without prejudice to any other provisions of the member states which prohibit officials from appearing.

The European Parliament may set up temporary committees under their own rules of procedure. Such committees can request witnesses and experts to make a statement or provide testimony. There is no obligation on those individuals to respond to that invitation.

Gibraltar

Mr. Hendrick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the arrangements made with Spain in respect of Gibraltar Airport to unblock the progress of EC aviation measures. [66422]

Peter Hain: We have agreed a procedure with Spain and the Commission allowing aviation measures to be unblocked, without prejudicing any party's position on sovereignty, or affecting day to day operations at Gibraltar airport. When such a measure is brought forward, the Commission will judge whether or not it places obligations on airports. If so, the Council and Commission will agree to the insertion of the clauses suspending application until the implementation of the 1987 Joint Declaration of the UK and Spain on Gibraltar airport, which have featured in previous measures. If not, the text will not be amended. The Transport Council agreed Common Positions on the first measures subject to this arrangement, relating to occurrence reporting and aviation statistics, on 17 June.

We are confident that suspension will have no material impact on the operation of Gibraltar airport. We will continue to work with the Government of Gibraltar and the authorities at Gibraltar airport to ensure that, wherever necessary, equivalent measures are implemented on a national basis.

The Government believes that this is the best way forward until a long-term solution is found. We have always made clear that we want Gibraltar to enjoy the full benefits of EC aviation measures, as is its right. But, since the 11 September atrocities in particular, it is essential for British and other European air travellers, and the companies concerned, that EC measures to improve the functioning of the aviation sector, and especially to enhance aviation security, are taken forward quickly and effectively. It would be intolerable if all air travellers were denied the benefit of such measures because of delay caused by disagreement between the UK and Spain over Gibraltar and the refusal of the Government of Gibraltar to join discussions to resolve such problems under the Brussels process.

EU Events

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the (a) forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union for July and (b) major European Union events for the period between 1 August and December. [66082]

Visas

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on UK visa fees. [66083]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: On 26 June, the Privy Council made the Consular Fees Order 2002, which sets out the new fees for UK visas with effect from 1 July.

Members of the House will recall that on 17 June the House approved the draft section 102 Order, made under The Finance (No. 2) Act 1987—following a debate in the Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation on 11 June. The section 102 Order provides the legal authority for the visa fee increase by allowing past deficits incurred in the costs of running the Entry Clearance operation to be taken into account when setting visa fees and for the cross-subsidisation of the costs of different entry clearance services.

Most visa fees will go up by between 8 per cent. and 10 per cent. The main increases are:

Standard visit visa: up 9 per cent. from £33 to £36

The single entry visa has ceased to exist since the introduction in October 2000 of visas of leave to enter. The new standard visa for multiple entries valid for six months at £36 is cheaper than the old six-month multiple-entry visa, which provided the same level of service at a cost of £45.

Five-year multiple-entry visa: up 10 per cent. from £80 to £88

Settlement visa: up 8 per cent. from £240 to £260

In addition, the long-term non-settlement visa fee will increase by 50 per cent. from £50 to £75.

A new 10-year multiple entry visa priced at £150 is also being introduced for the first time. There is growing demand for this kind of visa. Its introduction will provide an enhanced service to regular travellers to the UK, without compromising the integrity of the Immigration Control.

The Consular Fees Order setting new visa fees is being made not only to cover current costs but also to recover past deficits of visa fees (from April 2000), caused by the increased cost of the entry clearance operation worldwide. It is intended that these increases will return the entry clearance operation to a self-financing basis by 2003–04.

We recognise that these fee increases will be unwelcome. However, we must make sure that the full cost of providing a visa service is covered by visa fees.

To put these increases into context:

These would be the first fee increase for visitor's visas since 1995

The proposed increases still keep UKvisas within their Service Delivery Agreement commitment not to increase visa fees in real terms

The standard visit visa at £36 is still cheaper than the old six-month multiple entry visa which provided the same level of service at a cost of £45

Applicants now get more for their money. Since October 2000, the standard visit visa has not only allowed people to visit the UK on multiple occasions during the validity of their leave to enter, they also benefit from an enhanced and speedier immigration process on arrival.

UKvisas is undertaking a range of measures to reduce costs and increase productivity. But these alone will not be sufficient to recover the deficit. The increases will enable UKvisas not only to recover past deficits, but also to cover the increased costs of the provision of visa services.

East Timor

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what continuing support the Government will offer to East Timor. [66089]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Further to my answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, column 721, I should clarify that at the Donor Conference in Dili on 14–15 May, the UK confirmed its pledge of £12 million to East Timor over the next three years. This brings the total UK assistance package to over £30 million since 1999.

Western Sahara

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of France concerning the future mineral exploitation of the Western Sahara; and if he will make a statement. [64864]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I am informed that we have had no discussions with the Government of France concerning the future mineral exploitation of the Western Sahara.

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations have been made to the Government of Morocco concerning their occupation of the Western Sahara. [64861]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We regularly discuss the issue of Western Sahara with the Government of the Kingdom of Morocco. My predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), raised the issue during his visit to Morocco in September 2001 and when he met with Mohammed Benaissa the Moroccan Foreign Minister during his visit to London in March 2002. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State also discussed the subject with Mohammed Benaissa during his visit to London in February 2002.

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the British contribution has been to Minurso for each of the past five years. [64862]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The British contribution to Minurso over the past five years is as follows:

1997–98	934,360
1998–99	2,369,371
1999–2000	1,014,550
2000–01	1,984,177
2001–02	2,148,347

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made to the UN Secretary General concerning the proposals by his representative on the future of the Western Sahara; and if he will make a statement. [64863]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The mandate for the UN Mission for a Referendum in Western Sahara is due for renewal on 31 July. The UN Secretary General asked UN Security Council members to choose a suitable direction for his special envoy James Baker, to pursue in helping the parties find a solution to the dispute in Western Sahara.

UK officials have been working with American, French and other Security Council colleagues in New York and in the capitals of Security Council members in an effort to reach a consensus on a suitable direction before 31 July.

The UK has maintained a consistent position, that we continue to support the efforts of the United Nations Secretary General in trying to find a just and durable resolution to the dispute.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which overseas Governments he has consulted since the Zimbabwean Presidential elections on their acceptance of (a) the result and (b) the legitimacy of these elections. [65999]

Mr. MacShane: We have discussed the result and legitimacy of the Presidential election in Zimbabwe with our European Union partners, the Commonwealth, members of the Southern African Development Community and other concerned members of the international community, including the United States.

Correspondence

David Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Walsall, North of 28 May regarding a constituent. [65576]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My officials at UKvisas replied to the hon. Member for Walsall, North's letters of 28 May on 24 and 26 June 2002.

Chechnya

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what monitoring of human rights in Chechnya has been undertaken by UK representatives. [64859]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The embassy in Moscow sends regular reports of the human rights situation in Chechnya, though the security situation has meant that we permit no British Government personnel to visit the region. There are however a number of non-governmental organisations active in monitoring human rights in Chechnya, with whom we are in close touch.

EU Applicants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the Government's assessment of the economic and social impact on the United Kingdom of the accession to the EU of the Eastern European applicant nations. [61765]

Peter Hain [pursuant to his reply, 17 June 2002, c. 7]: The answer that was given to my right hon. Friend on 17 June contained an error. The full correct answer is as follows:

The Government have not made an integrated study of the economic and social impact of EU enlargement on the United Kingdom. However, independent economic studies by the European Round Table of Industrialists and the Centre for Economic Policy Reform show that EU enlargement could increase UK GDP by £1.75 billion and create 300,000 jobs among the EU-15. I have placed copies of these reports in the House of Commons Library.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Countryside and Rights of Way Act

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 8 March 2002, Official Report, column 641–2W, what progress has been made on regional introduction of the freedom to roam under the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. [63508]

Alun Michael: As my noble Friend the Lord Whitty answered in another place on 10 April, (HL Deb. column WA 92), we are persuaded of the potential advantages to walkers of bringing the right of access into force on a regional basis. We need to think further about the practical considerations in respect of, for example, managing access and ensuring that members of the public are properly informed of their rights and responsibilities.

We are looking very carefully at this, and we will make an announcement when we have reached a decision.

Animal Welfare

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much her Department and its predecessors have spent on animal welfare in each of the last five years for which figures are available, broken down by category. [63648]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 24 June 2002]: These figures represent the outturn for the Animal Health and Veterinary Group (AHVG) and the amount spent on animal welfare R&D for the last five years. The reduction in expenditure in 2001–02 reflects the diversion of effort on to foot and mouth disease. The total figure for that year actually continued the upward trend of previous years.

Year	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02[1]
AHVG Outturn	107	126	152	183	159
Animal Welfare R&D	4.1	3.7	3.4	3.7	3.2

[1] Provisional—subject to audit

Private Veterinary Surgeons

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much her Department has paid private veterinary surgeons for contract work with her Department (a) in total and (b) per hour in each of the last ten years for which figures are available. [63647]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 24 June 2002]: DEFRA came into being on 8 June 2001. The information requested can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Committee Mandates

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the mandate of the Advisory Committee on Forestry and Cork is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [61715]

Mr. Morley: The mandate of the Advisory Committee on Forestry and Cork is to improve communication throughout the EU forestry sector. It comprises representatives from private sector forestry and forest industries and enables primarily non-governmental practitioners from member states to present their views on forestry and the forestry industry, policy and developments directly to the European Commission.

The committee has met twice in the last 12 months. The UK is represented by the Forestry Commission and the private forestry sector. The approximate annual cost of the committee's work to public funds is £400.

The committee is currently considering the role of forestry in the context of EU rural development policy, implementation of the EU forestry strategy and the availability of wood.

Together with member states, the commission is currently conducting a review to bring existing legislation on the conduct of comitology committees into line with Council Decision 1999/468/EC, to "simplify the requirements for the exercise of implementing powers conferred on the commission".

As an obligation to this decision, the commission undertook to publish an annual report on the working of committees. The first report was deposited in the Library of the House on 26 February (Commission Document 5685/02).

As part of the review process, the UK Government have encouraged the commission to produce and maintain an electronic database of every comitology committee, its agendas and recent actions, to be accessible through its website.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the mandate of the Scientific Technical and Economic Committee on Fisheries is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [61704]

Mr. Morley: The Scientific, Technical and Economic Committee for Fisheries is a permanent committee set up within the European Commission as a source of highly qualified scientific assistance (particularly in the application of marine and fisheries biology, fishing technology, fishing economics or similar disciplines) in relation to the implementation of the Community system for fisheries and aquaculture. The committee holds two plenary meetings per year, plus ad hoc expert groups. The UK is currently represented by scientists from the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science and the FRS Marine Laboratory. The commission pays travel and subsistence costs: only the cost of the experts' time, as part of their broad duty to provide scientific advice, falls to national Governments. The committee draws up annual reports on the biological, technical and economic aspects of the fisheries resource situation and on work and requirements in relation to the co-ordination of research for the fisheries and aquaculture sector. It also provides advice to the commission on prospective proposals for action.

As the committee's role is to provide scientific, technical and economic advice to the commission, there are no issues over accountability and transparency to Parliament.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the mandate of the Advisory Committee on Community Policy Regarding Forestry and Forest-based Industries is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [61727]

Mr. Morley: The mandate of the Advisory Committee on Community Policy regarding Forestry and Forest-based Industries is to encourage the forest-based industry to become a model sector in the field of sustainable development.

The Committee has met once in the last 12 months. The UK is represented by members of the forestry industry. The cost to public funds for the last 12 months was £200.

The key issues currently under consideration are securing sufficient supplies of sustainable produced raw material and the enhanced use of wood.

Together with member states, the Commission is currently conducting a review to bring existing legislation on the conduct of comitology committees into line with Council Decision 1999/468/EC, to "simplify the requirements for the exercise of implementing powers conferred on the Commission".

As an obligation to this Decision, the Commission undertook to publish an annual report on the working of committees. The first report was deposited in the Library of the House on 26 February (Commission Document 5685–02).

As part of the review process, the UK Government have encouraged the Commission to produce and maintain an electronic database of every comitology committee, its agendas and recent actions, to be accessible through its website.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the mandate of the Advisory Committee on Non-Food and Textile Crops is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [61719]

Mr. Morley: The Advisory Committee on Non-Food and Textile Crops is a consultative committee of the European Commission. Its purpose is to facilitate consultation with industry representatives with an interest in the EU regime for natural fibres but we understand it has not met for some time. It is not attended by officials of Her Majesty's Government and does not give rise to costs to UK public funds.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the mandate of the Committee for the adaptation to technical and scientific progress of the Directive on the prevention and reduction of environmental pollution by asbestos is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [56818]

Mr. Meacher: The mandate of the Committee for the adaptation to technical and scientific progress of the Directive on the prevention and reduction of environmental pollution by asbestos is to make changes to the technical annex on methods of sampling and analysis of asbestos concentrations in air or water. This Committee has not met in the last 12 months, so has had no costs to public funds and has not considered any items.

Staff Numbers

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many staff were employed by her Department on (a) 2 May 1997 and (b) 31 May 2002. [60921]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office on 13 June 2002, Official Report, column 1402W.

Warm Front Scheme

Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what progress has been made in reducing fuel poverty through the Warm Front Scheme; how many households have been assisted in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01; how much the average cost was in (i) 1999–2000 and (ii) 2000–01 of assisting each household via the Warm Front Scheme in terms of (A) actual cost of the measures carried out and (B) the average cost of the administration which enabled households to receive the measures; what the measures, the planned expenditure is on warm front in (1) 2002–03 and (2) 2003–04; and what the percentage change has been in expenditure in each region of the UK since 1999–2000. [60668]

Mr. Meacher: The new Home Energy Efficiency Scheme, launched in June 2000 is marketed as Warm Front.

The table provides details for the previous HEES, which provided insulation measures only (column two), Warm Front from launch of the scheme in June 2000 to March 2001 (column three) and April 2001 to March 2002 (column four).

	April 1999 to March 2000	June 2000 to March 2001	April 2001 to March 2002
Number of households assisted who receive either insulation, heating or both	339,000	106,800	254,600
Average value per household (£)	176	322	464
Value of measures (£)	59,670,000	34,360,000	140,600,000

The reduction in the number of households assisted by Warm Front reflects the introduction of the package approach of measures combining insulation and heating under the scheme. There was also a slow start for gas heating due to the national shortage of trained heating engineers. Measures installed may include cavity wall, loft insulation, draught proofing, individual gas wall heaters or electric storage heaters and either gas or electric central heating systems.

These figures do not identify the scheme managers' administration costs. Information regarding administration costs is commercially sensitive and could be used in future tender rounds to unfairly distort the competition process.

The budget for Warm Front, an England only scheme, for the financial years 2000 to 2004 is over £600 million. The information on the percentage change of expenditure for each region in the UK is not held in the format requested for individual households and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Information on the measures installed at individual property in 2000–01 has previously been provided on 15 January 2002, Official Report, column 261W. A copy of the data referred to in that answer is available on CD-Rom in the Library.

We will carry out a review of Warm Front during this financial year to look at how effective its delivery has been, the issues faced, solutions found, examples of best practice and future priorities. This will include consideration of the impact of the scheme on reducing the number of vulnerable fuel poor households.

Bees

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many (a) notifications and (b) confirmations of specified diseases under the Bee Diseases Control Order 1982 there were in each region in each of the last 10 years. [63521]

Mr. Morley: There are three notifiable diseases specified under the Bee Diseases Control Order 1982—American foulbrood; European foulbrood; and Varroosis (varroa). All new suspected cases have to be reported, and in England investigations are carried out by the National Bee Unit (NBU). The numbers of notifications and confirmations of these diseases are set out in the table below by NBU region. Data for American and European foulbrood before 1994 is not available.

[1] 2002 data to 20 June

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent (a) representations she has received from and (b) discussions she has had with the beekeeping industry; and if she will make a statement. [63522]

Mr. Morley: My officials meet annually with representatives of the UK beekeeping sector. The most recent meeting was held on 8 November 2001, when a range of issues affecting the sector were discussed, including measures to control bee diseases. The Central Science Laboratory's National Bee Unit (NBU) also meets beekeepers regularly.

Most recently, the Department has received a number of written representations from beekeepers about financial burdens placed on Bee Diseases Insurance (BDI) Ltd. We welcome BDI's role in encouraging beekeepers in England to play their part in the identification of notifiable diseases. However, the issue of payments by insurance companies is a matter for the Financial Services Authority (FSA) and affiliated bodies. My officials have passed these representations to these organisations as appropriate.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much has been spent by her Department on bee (a) husbandry and (b) disease prevention by category in each of the last 10 years. [63524]

Mr. Morley: The Department assists the beekeeping sector in England by funding a range of measures to protect bee health. Under these measures, the national bee unit provides a free diagnostic and inspection service to the beekeeping sector as well as training and education to help beekeepers become more self reliant through improved bee husbandry. The Department also supports the beekeeping sector through strategic research into bee pests and diseases.

It is not possible to differentiate expenditure between bee husbandry and disease control. All fieldwork undertaken by the national bee unit is for the purpose of disease prevention and control. Departmental expenditure on R&D for the period 1992–93 to 2001–02 is set out in the table. Prior to 1994 the regional offices of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food were responsible for bee disease control. In 1994 this work was centralised within the national bee unit and aggregated figures are not available for earlier years.

1992–93	—	61,000	61,000
1993–94	—	140,000	140,000
1994–95	1,511,000	314,000	1,825,000
1995–96	1,534,000	259,000	1,793,000

2001–02	1,300,000	187,000	1,487,000

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many registered beekeepers there were in each region in each of the last 10 years. [63578]

Mr. Morley: There is no compulsory registration of beekeepers in England. The database held by the Central Science Laboratory's National Bee Unit, which is used to maintain records of statutory inspections, holds details of some 25,000 beekeepers.

Curry Report

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the timetable and implementation of the Curry report. [63525]

Mr. Morley: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 26 March a series of early actions as a first step towards implementing the report. At the same time, a comprehensive process of engagement with a wide range of stakeholders was launched to explore how to translate the commission's vision into action. This has included a series of regional and sectoral events and the publication of a document, "Sustainable Food and Farming: Working Together". Feedback from these is now being analysed and will help inform construction of a Strategy for Sustainable Food and Farming in England, to be launched in the autumn. The strategy will incorporate a response to all of the Policy Commission's recommendations.

Beef Exports

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she plans to meet her French counterpart to discuss the ban on British beef exports. [63526]

Mr. Morley: The Secretary of State regularly raises the French Government's illegal ban on British beef with her French counterpart. The Prime Minister also made it clear when he met President Chirac on 19 June that he expected the new French Government to lift their ban on the import of UK date-based export scheme beef rapidly.

Air Pollution

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on what date the standards for the eight pollutants named in the National Air Quality Strategy were last reviewed; and on what date they will next be reviewed. [64666]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The standards within the Air Quality Strategy are recommended to Ministers by the Expert Panel on Air Quality Standards (EPAQS) or are based on the limit values in the European Union's Air Quality Daughter Directives. The Expert Panel on Air Quality Standards and their secretariat keep a watching brief on the literature for the health effects of air pollutants and make recommendations to the Department when they are aware of information that could change their original point of view.

The table sets out when each of the standards was first proposed, dates of any reviews already carried out and plans for future reviews.

Pollutant	First produced	Reviewed	Next review
Benzene	February 1994 by EPAQS	EU Second Daughter Directive limit value to be adopted in 2002	Daughter Directive requires the European Commission to report by 2004
1,3-butadiene	December 1994 by EPAQS	EPAQS second report due to be published shortly
Carbon monoxide	December 1994 by EPAQS	EU Second Daughter Directive limit value to be adopted in 2002	Daughter Directive requires the European Commission to report by 2004
Lead	May 1998 by EPAQS	EU First Daughter Directive limit value adopted in 1999	Daughter Directive requires the European Commission to report by 2003

Pollutant	First produced	Reviewed	Next review
Nitrogen dioxide	December 1996 by EPAQS	EU First Daughter Directive limit value adopted in 1999	To be reviewed by European Commission in 2003
Ozone	May 1994 by EPAQS	EU Third Daughter Directive limit value to be adopted in 2003	Under review as part of the Clear Air for Europe programme
Particulate matter	November 1995 by EPAQS	EU First Daughter Directive limit value adopted in 1999	To be reviewed by European Commission in 2003
Sulphur dioxide	September 1995 by EPAQS	EU First Daughter Directive limit value adopted in 1999	Daughter Directive requires the European Commission to report by 2003

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many air quality monitoring sites operate in the United Kingdom; how many of these sites monitor all the pollutants named in the National Air Quality Strategy; and how many of these sites recorded air quality exceedences for each of the pollutants named in the National Air Quality Strategy. [64661]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 27 June 2002]: There are a total of 1,709 air quality monitoring sites in United Kingdom. These are broken down by network in Table 1 below.

Table 1: Number of air quality monitoring sites in the United Kingdom

	Number of sites
Automatic monitoring (nitrogen dioxide, sulphur dioxide, PM_{10}, carbon monoxide, ozone, benzene, 1,3-butadiene)	122
Non-automatic monitoring:
Nitrogen dioxide diffusion tubes	1309
Black smoke/sulphur dioxide	150
Rural sulphur dioxide	40
Rural nitrogen dioxide diffusion tube	32
Lead	6
Benzene	28
Hazardous air pollutants (PCBs, Dioxins, polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons)	22
Total	1709

No sites monitor all the pollutants in the Air Quality Strategy. However, London Marylebone Road monitors all the pollutants except lead. The number of sites recording air quality exceedences for the pollutants named in the Strategy during 2001 are given in Table 2 below.

Table 2: number of sites exceeding the standards and objectives in the Air Quality Strategy in 2001

Automatic sites	Standard	Objective	Number of sites exceeding Air Quality Strategy standard in 2001	Number of sites exceeding Air Quality Strategy objective in 2001

Non-Automatic sites			Number of sites exceeding Air Quality Strategy standard in 2001	Number of sites exceeding Air Quality Strategy objective in 2001
Nitrogen dioxide	Annual mean 40 micrograms per metre cubed		251
Sulphur dioxide	Daily mean, 125 micrograms per metre cubed	not to be exceeded more than 3 times per year	8	4
Lead	Annual mean, 0.5 micrograms per metre cubed		0	0

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when (a) 1,3-butadienes, (b) polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, (c) cadmium, (d) arsenic, (e) nickel and (f) mercury will be added to the pollutants monitored under the National Air Quality Strategy for the United Kingdom. [64663]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Of these pollutants:

(a) 1,3 butadiene is already one of the eight pollutants covered by the Air Quality Strategy for England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, published in January 2000 ("the Strategy");

(b) we consulted in September 2001 on the possibility of adding polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAH) to the list of pollutants covered by the Strategy, and hope to make an announcement on this shortly. Levels of PAH in the UK are currently measured at 21 sites, and we hope to add a further 4 sites to the network as soon as possible;

(c) we have no immediate plans to add cadmium, arsenic, nickel and mercury to the list of pollutants covered by the Strategy. Our monitoring shows that levels of these pollutants in ambient air in the UK are not generally a cause for concern, and the UK National Atmospheric Emissions Inventory (NAEI) estimates that emissions of each have fallen significantly in recent years. Between 1990 and 1999, for example, estimated emissions of cadmium, arsenic, nickel and mercury fell by 71 per cent. 69 per cent., 47 per cent., and 65 per cent. respectively.

We understand that the planned Fourth European Union Air Quality Daughter Directive may include proposals in respect of PAH, cadmium, arsenic, nickel and mercury. We intend to keep under review the need for separate national measures on these pollutants in the light of progress with negotiations on the Directive.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what efforts have been taken to ensure the Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants plays a role in supporting the United Kingdom's input into air pollution policy making within the European Union. [64665]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The Committee on Medical Effects of Air Pollutants is a Department of Health non-departmental public body. Its advice is published in Reports and Statements, which are publicly available on the Committee's website "http://www.doh.gov.uk/comeap/index.htm". As necessary we draw attention to that advice in contacts and in negotiations with the Commission and other member states. The advice from the Committee is taken into account in developing a UK position on proposals for new air quality legislation.

The World Health Organisation (WHO) is currently carrying out reviews on the health impacts of particulate matter and ozone, which will feed into air pollution policy in the European Union. Department of Health officials ensure that WHO is aware of the work of the Committee.

Environmental Performance (FTSE Companies)

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will place a list of FTSE 350 companies and their reporting on their environmental performance in the Library; and if she will make a statement. [64788]

Mr. Meacher: In April we wrote to companies in the FTSE350 asking them what they had done to respond to the Prime Minister's challenge to report on their environmental performance. We are currently awaiting a few late replies and will shortly be able to provide a final update to the list placed in the Library of the House in response to the hon. Gentleman's question of 21 March, showing FTSE 350 companies with details of their reporting.

Environmental Information

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what steps her Department (a) has taken and (b) plans to take in relation to the development of labelling of environmental information for consumers; and if she will make a statement; [64791]

(2) what steps (a) have been taken and (b) are planned by her Department to provide environmental information for consumers; and if she will make a statement. [64790]

Mr. Meacher: The Government are keen to ensure that consumers have clear and relevant information about the environmental effects of consumer products. It has appointed the Advisory Committee on Consumer Products and the Environment (ACCPE) to look at opportunities for developing better quality environmental information, as part of the Committee's remit to advise on ways of reducing the impacts of consumer products on the environment.

The Government are considering a number of ACCPE's recommendations for improving product information. These include proposals for improving the quality of self-declared environmental claims, which are being explored further by the Department taking into account stakeholders' views. The Government are also considering ACCPE's proposals for developing a common label for homes, cars and domestic appliances, based on the format of the EU Energy label. In the case of homes, we are looking to develop a methodology for assessing the energy efficiency of existing homes more cost effectively, and this will include a look at the possibilities for comparative energy rating. A comparative label for cars is being considered by DfT in the light of the response to their recent consultation paper on this topic.

ACCPE has also proposed setting up a new internet information service which could provide advice and guidance on the environmental impacts of products and the scope for making more sustainable consumption choices. It recommended that the Government should first commission a feasibility study into such a project, and this has been done. Having considered the results of this study, ACCPE have made further recommendations in their second report, "Action for Greener Products: A toolbox for change", published in May, about the practicalities of piloting a new service. The Government are currently considering how a pilot can be taken forward. Copies of ACCPE's second report have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

The Department already publishes and promotes the Green Claims Code which gives best practice advice to business and the consumer on environmental information and labelling.

We have also published, distributed and continue to promote a number of information leaflets to help business and consumers in this area. These include "Hi I'm Green" which is a guide to the most commonly occurring environmental claims and labels on products and explains how to ask for further information; "Energy labels for refrigeration and washing appliances—helping you make the right choice", which outlines the EU energy label scheme; and "Pick the flower—the ecolabel" which explains the EU ecolabelling scheme. Copies of all these leaflets have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what (a) guidance and (b) legislation is (i) in place and (ii) planned with regards to labelling of environmental information for consumers; and if she will make a statement. [64789]

Mr. Meacher: The Department's Green Claims Code provides guidance on good practice in the making of environmental claims. It is intended as an introduction to the more detailed guidance in the International Standard ISO14021. The Department has no plans at present to revise the Code.

There is no specific piece of legislation regarding environmental information for consumers, but trading standards officers have powers under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 to deal with claims that are demonstrably false. The Director General of Fair Trading can also take action against misleading environmental claims under the Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations 1988. The Government are committed to ensuring that the regulatory framework for tackling misleading green claims is effective and will keep the need for any new legislation under review.

In respect of individual environmental labelling schemes, the European Community Energy Label must be displayed on all new domestic refrigerators, freezers and fridge-freezer combinations, washing machines, electric tumble dryers, combined washer-dryers, dishwashers and lamps displayed for sale, hire or hire-purchase. The UK and other member states have until 1 January 2003 to transpose Directives 2002/31/EC and 2002/40/EC which will extend this requirement to household air conditioners and electric ovens. Details of relevant legislation can be found at http://www.defra.gov.uk/environment/mtp/index.htm#S3

A separate scheme, the European ecolabel award, is designed to encourage manufacturers to reduce the environmental impacts of a growing range of products, and to encourage consumers to choose products with the label. The scheme was set up in 1992 by EU Regulation 880–92, which was revised in 2000 by Regulation 1980–2000. As Regulations, these took effect automatically in UK law without further legislation.

Participation by manufacturers is voluntary, but under the Regulations member states are required to promote the scheme and to designate competent bodies to run it. In the UK the scheme is administered by the Secretary of State. DEFRA has a website giving guidance about the scheme http://www.defra.gov.uk/environment/ecolabel/index.htm, and has produced explanatory and promotional leaflets about it for business and consumers.

Food Contamination

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether her Department is producing a strategy to reduce emissions of dioxins and dioxin contamination of food. [63904]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 26 June 2002]: With the devolved Administrations, other Government Departments and Agencies my Department will shortly be producing a UK consultation paper on dioxins and dioxin-like PCBs. This will draw on the wealth of recent information coming from scientific research, both in the UK and internationally, to improve our understanding of their formation, emissions, environmental transport and effects.

This consultation paper will provide an opportunity for all stakeholders to consider and comment on what further actions will be required, as part of an UK action plan, to continue the trend of reducing environmental and human exposure to these compounds.

Flood Risk

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent assessment she has made of information compiled by the insurance industry on flood risk, based upon Environment Agency maps. [64933]

Mr. Morley: Ministers, and officials in DEFRA and the Environment Agency are in active discussions with the insurance industry in developing a shared understanding of genuine flood risk. In order to achieve this, DEFRA and the EA are working together to build upon the information provided by the current flood plain maps to include information on present and future flood defences. Once more informative data on risk have been developed it will be shared with the industry so that they may use it when making commercial decisions based on risk assessments. The Department continues to pursue its aim to reduce flood risk including through significant investments in flood alleviation measures.

Sheep Dip

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when in 1991 the Health and Safety Executive met representatives from the VMD and the National Office for Animal Health to discuss sheep dip surveys; and if she will place the minutes of the meetings in the Library. [63700]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 25 June 2002]: A meeting took place on 25 February 1991 between VMD, HSE and the National Office for Animal Health (NOAH) to discuss the HSE safety survey on sheep dips and Controls of Substances Hazardous to Health (COSHH) in general. Despite extensive searches of records by all three parties in response to earlier inquiries, no minutes from that meeting can be traced.

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) when in 1993 non-OP ingredients in sheep dip were removed from the market; and when the licence for such products was withdrawn by the VMD; [63698]

(2) when in 1991 sheep dip manufacturers were asked by executive agencies and non-departmental public bodies under the remit of her Department to change the formulations for sheep dip; and on what date the changes were effected. [63701]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 25 June 2002]: Almost all veterinary medicinal products contain ingredients in addition to their main active ingredient. Minor changes to these ingredients in individual veterinary medicinal products are not unusual.

In 1993 a number of OP sheep dip product manufacturers removed phenols from their formulations. A full report of the regulatory action that led to this action is available on the Veterinary Medicines Directorate (VMD)'s website. Copies of this report have also been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The manufacture of UK authorised OP sheep dip products containing phenols ceased on 31 March 1993.

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she has taken to secure publication of the 1992 study into sheep dip products carried out by the Central Veterinary Laboratory for the VMD. [63699]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 25 June 2002]: We are not aware of any such Central Veterinary Laboratory study into sheep dip products for the VMD.

Fisheries

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment her departmental scientists have made, or been advised of, of the (a) stock levels, (b) fishing mortality levels and (c) estimated biological limits for each of the commercial species known to be caught by UK fishermen in the deep water at or beyond the continental shelf. [62625]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 17 June 2002]: Scientists from the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science join with international colleagues in the Advisory Committee on Fisheries Management (ACFM) of the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea (ICES), in agreeing and publishing annual scientific advice on the management of commercially exploited fish stocks. The latest advice from the ACFM on deep water species is contained in the committee's report published following its meeting in May 2002. Broadly, the advice on most such species is that the balance of available evidence suggests that they should be subjected only to substantially reduced—or in some cases to very low—rates of exploitation.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what advice she has received from the European Commission on the extent of competence which it may be possible to convey under the existing regulatory framework to proposed regional advisory councils as set out under its reformed Common Fisheries Policy. [62598]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 17 June 2002]: The commission's proposals for the establishment of regional advisory councils envisage that they would have the following functions:

(a) to submit suggestions, of their own accord or at the request of the commission or a member state, on matters relating to fisheries management to the commission of the member states concerned;

(b) to give opinions on commission or member state proposals for fisheries management;

(c) to comment on and recommend improvements in the application of Community legislation.

The precise role to be given to regional advisory councils will be one of the important matters to be addressed in the forthcoming negotiations in the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will impose bag limits on the landing of fish by recreational anglers. [64383]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Limits on the amount of crabs and lobsters that hobby fishermen can take from the sea are being considered as part of the proposed shellfish licensing scheme. The Department is looking at the possibility of bag limits for other species and I would hope to be able to reach firm conclusions this autumn. Any proposals to introduce bag limits will be the subject of consultation with both commercial and recreational interests.

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the outcome of the Fisheries Council held on 11 June was; what the Government's stance on the issues discussed, including its voting record was; and if she will make a statement. [62931]

Mr. Morley: I represented the United Kingdom at a meeting of the EU Council of Fisheries Ministers in Luxembourg on 11 June, together with Ross Finnie, Minister for Environment and Rural Development in the Scottish Executive and Mrs. Brid Rodgers, the Northern Ireland Minister for Agriculture and Rural Development.

The commissioner gave an introductory presentation on his proposals for the future of the Common Fisheries Policy, as published on 29 May. Negotiations on this are scheduled to take place during the remainder of 2002, with the aim of reaching conclusions by the year-end. Ministers took the opportunity to state their initial reactions. For the United Kingdom I said that, though of course we would have concerns to pursue on some issues, we could support the broad thrust of the proposals, aimed as they are at addressing the risk of stock collapse and creating a sustainable future for the fishing industry: I said the commission was right in particular to have proposed an end to subsidies for building new vessels, continued adherence to relative stability as the method of allocating fishing opportunities among member states, and the setting up of regional advisory councils to improve stakeholders' involvement in decisions on the management of fisheries. I also emphasised the need to examine the socio-economic impact of the commission proposals and to be ready in the short-term to help the communities that depend on fishing to respond to what will inevitably be difficult circumstances.

Some member states expressed similar broad support, while others indicated significant dissent, especially in relation to the reduction of fishing effort, the ending of construction grants and what they alleged was the failure of the commission's proposals to take account of the diversity of fishing operations across the EU.

There was a useful policy debate on the commission proposal for long-term recovery plans for threatened cod and hake stocks. Aspects covered included the methodology for setting recovery targets for these stocks, the need to limit fishing effort and the ways in which this might be done, additional funding for scrapping vessels, monitoring and inspection and the introduction of emergency measures to safeguard stocks. Various views were expressed: for the UK, I gave a qualified welcome to the commission's proposal, emphasising the need for engaging with the industry in a full debate on effort control and the importance of ensuring the permanent scrapping of excess fleet capacity rather than funding the temporary tie-up of vessels. The presidency referred the dossier back to working level for development.

On the protection of deep water species, the Council considered a joint presidency/commission compromise and by qualified majority reached political agreement on total allowable catches (TACs) and quotas for certain stocks of black scabbardfish, blue ling, greater silver smelt, ling, orange roughy, red seabream, roundnose grenadier and tusk. It also agreed, again by qualified majority, a general approach on a measure introducing a permit requirement limiting fishing capacity in relation to certain deep sea species.

I declared the United Kingdom's opposition to this pair of measures. The permit system and associated provisions for data gathering are welcome in that they may eventually facilitate the introduction of the effort limitation that is truly needed to give these fragile stocks the protection that they need. But we could not support the package as a whole because of the lack of urgency in bringing about effort limitation and because of the unsatisfactory measures to protect these species in the interim. We do not consider that these measures go anything like far enough to protect these fragile species, given the bleakness of the scientists' advice. Setting TACs and quotas, especially when some species are omitted and not all areas are covered, is not in our view an adequate response. I also thought the levels of TAC too high and not based on sound science.

The Council also adopted, unanimously, conclusions reiterating its commitment to combat illegal, unreported and unregulated fishing—a very welcome conclusion in view of the threat posed to sustainable management of global fish stocks by the activities of flag of convenience vessels.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with (a) the European Commission and (b) other EU fishing nations in respect of the maintenance of the relative stability parameters throughout the period of the reformed common fisheries policy commencing in January 2003. [62623]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 17 June 2002]: I have welcomed the Commission's proposal to continue to allocate Total Allowable Catches among member states on the basis of relative stability. This mechanism has widespread support, provides a degree of predictability for fishermen and is a fair way to allocate resources. The Commission's proposal on this is one element of a comprehensive package of Commission proposals on the future of the common fisheries policy: I expect extensive discussions with the Commission and other EU member states on the totality of this package to take place during coming months.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the implications of the proposed European road map for the reform of the common fisheries policy in respect of (a) in-shore fishermen, (b) the future management of shellfish, (c) the management of multi-annual quotas, (d) the future market for the trade in quotas, (e) the confidence in retaining relative stability, (f) the opportunities to give fishing industry stakeholders executive power to make policy and management decisions and (g) the prospects for the future of the United Kingdom fishing industry. [62597]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 17 June 2002]: The Commission published its first set of proposals for reform of the Common Fisheries Policy on 28 May 2002. Our preliminary assessment is that the aims of the proposals are broadly in line with the UK view developed in the light of our consultation with stakeholders last year about the Commission's Green Paper on the subject. We shall in coming weeks be assessing, again in consultation with all interested parties in the UK, all the possible implications of the Commission's proposals.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the European Commission's proposals for fleet reductions set out on page 49 of draft Council Regulation 2002/0114. [61609]

Margaret Beckett [holding answer 19 June 2002]: The Commission have made clear that they do not seek to impose cuts in fleet capacity on member states. Their figures which detail fleet cuts by member states are to be taken as purely illustrative. The scale of decommissioning in any individual member state will depend on the decisions taken by the Council on measures to reduce fishing effort and on the decisions by fishermen in the light of the impact of these measures.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what action she intends to take on the discarding of fish caught in the EU. [64506]

Mr. Morley: The Department and representatives of the UK fishing industry contributed to a workshop convened by the European Commission in May on options to reduce discarding. The Commission intends to publish an action plan this year to tackle discarding as part of its proposals for reform of the common fisheries policy. We will study carefully the Commission's proposals when they are published.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the impact the seal population has on sustainable fish stocks around the UK. [64543]

Mr. Morley: Based on 1985 diet data it is estimated that in 1998 240,000 tonnes of fish were consumed by grey seals and 75,000 tonnes by common seals. The predominant prey species of seals were sand eels, cod and whiting and most of the fish taken by seals are likely to have been juveniles. Given the high rates of natural mortality for these species, there is no guarantee that had they not been caught by seals, they would have survived to reach a size at which they would have been available to either commercial fishermen or anglers. We are currently funding the Sea Mammal Research Unit to undertake an update of this work.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the (a) gross tonnage and (b) kilowatts of engine power permanently withdrawn from (i) the beam trawling sector and (ii) the pelagic sector under MAGP IV; and what assessment she has made of the possibility of the UK meeting the required targets set under this programme by the end of the period. [61267]

Mr. Morley: The MAGP IV programme covers the period 1 January 1997 to 31 December 2002. The latest information available covers the situation up to 31 December 2001. During this period, a decommissioning scheme was operated in the UK in 1997 to permanently withdraw capacity and engine power from the UK fleet using public aid. This resulted in reductions in gross tonnage and engine power of 1,000 tonnes and 4,443 kilowatts for the beam trawl segment of the fleet, and nine tonnes and 97 kilowatts for the pelagic segment. Further reductions in the beam trawling segment are expected in 2002 as a result of the decommissioning schemes this year.

In addition, there have also been reductions in capacity resulting from capacity penalties on licence transfers and aggregations, and action to correct discrepancies in engine power. These reductions are permanent and are included within the assessments made of the overall gross tonnage and engine power of the UK fleet. However, separate data on such reductions are not routinely produced, and could not be made available without use of a disproportionate level of resources.

The MAGP IV programme uses a combination of targets for the total gross tonnage and engine power of different segments of the fishing fleet to be achieved by the end of the programme on 31 December 2002, along with an alternative of effort control objectives for each year that can be used for certain segments of the fleet. Both need to be borne in mind when considering whether or not the UK has met its objectives under MAGP IV. As such, using the fleet situation as at 31 December 2001, the UK was outside the targets for gross tonnage and engine power for the pelagic segment, but within the targets for the beam trawl segment. However, the UK was within the effort control objectives for both of these segments.

GM Crops

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will set out the sequence for regulation of the approval process for GM crops in the UK. [63592]

Mr. Meacher: Before a GMO, including a GM crop, can be released in the UK or the EU it must be assessed for safety to human health and the environment and be approved under either Part B or Part C of Directive 90/220/EEC on the Deliberate Release into the Environment of Genetically Modified Organisms.

Directive 90–220 has been updated and is being replaced by the new Directive 2001/18/EC, which must be implemented by member states by October 2002. My Department is currently consulting the public on draft implementing regulations for England. Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Parliamentary libraries and are available on the DEFRA website www.defra.gov.uk/environment/gm/index). The Scottish Executive, the National Assembly for Wales and the Department of Environment for Northern Ireland will make separate implementing regulations on issues for which they have devolved powers.

Decision making on proposed non-commercial releases of GMOs under Part B of the directive (e.g. research trials) occurs at the member state level. In England, a person wishing to undertake such a release must apply to DEFRA for a Part B consent, whereupon DEFRA seeks independent expert advice from the Advisory Committee on Releases into the Environment (ACRE) before a decision is taken on whether to grant or refuse a consent. Where appropriate the advice of other experts, for instance the Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes, will also be sought. Directive 2001–18 clarifies and extends risk assessments to ensure that "direct, indirect, immediate and delayed" effects on human health and the environment are covered. It also introduces a new requirement for mandatory public consultation before decisions on Part B applications are taken. We propose that such consultation should last for a minimum of 48 days.

Decision-making on proposed commercial releases of GMOs under Part C of the directive occurs at the EU level. A person wishing to market a GMO in the EU must apply for a Part C consent to a competent authority of one of the member states, and the competent authority must prepare a report recommending a course of action. If the report recommends that a consent is refused, the application is rejected. If the report recommends that a consent is granted it must be forwarded to the European Commission and other member states, which discuss the application and can ask for further information, make comments on, or present reasoned objections to, the proposed release. Under the new directive, the Commission must also consult the public (for two separate periods of 30 days) while the application is being considered, and responses are copied to all member states. The Commission and member states then make a collective decision on the application, and a Part C consent is either granted or refused.

Directive 2001–18 also introduces "post-market monitoring", under which any GMO which is granted a Part C consent must be monitored for unanticipated effects on the environment. The new directive (like its predecessor) ensures that if new information comes to light regarding the risks posed by the GMO to human health or the environment, the consent can be altered or revoked as appropriate.

GM crops are also subject to other legislation. Varieties of the main agricultural and vegetable species, whether GM or non-GM, cannot be marketed commercially until they have been added to the UK national list of plant varieties or to the EU Common Catalogue (a compendium of member states' national lists). Addition to the national list is dependent on satisfactory completion of a minimum of two years of listing trials, to establish that the variety is distinct, uniform and stable and, for agricultural species, has a value for cultivation and use in the UK. A GM crop cannot be formally proposed for addition to the national list until it has Part C marketing approval under the deliberate release directive (and Novel Foods authorisation where appropriate).

In addition to clearance of the crop itself, any foods obtained from a GM crop would have to be approved under the EU Novel Foods Regulation EC/258/97. The Food Standards Agency is the UK competent authority for this legislation. Furthermore, if the GM crop is a herbicide tolerant variety, the associated herbicide use would have to be approved under pesticides legislation.

Agricultural Shows

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the criteria are for the cost-effectiveness of her Department's stands at agricultural shows. [61813]

Mr. Morley: DEFRA assesses which events it will attend on the basis of target audience and the messages it is trying to communicate. Also taken into account are the numbers and geographical spread of the people who attend the shows.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many visitors to the South of England Agricultural Show visited her Department's stand. [61812]

Mr. Morley: No head count of visitors to DEFRA stands at agricultural shows, including the South of England, have been made. The stands have been designed to represent a forward looking approach and to enable effective and accessible explanation of:

the wider interests and responsibilities of the Department, and policies, issues and activities judged to be relevant to the potential audiences and geographical locations of the shows.

Foot and Mouth

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much money the Department has paid contractors for foot and mouth related work; and how much further money is owed. [58063]

Mr. Morley: By 24 May 2002 DEFRA and the Rural Payments Agency had spent over £1,100 million on goods and services to eradicate the disease.

Quantity surveyors, forensic accountants and claims surveyors are currently verifying and substantiating contractor accounts.

Wide ranging issues have arisen on the accounts. These include legal issues such as matters of contractual interpretation, forensic accountancy issues and evidential issues involving the assessment of both a large amount of documentation and proofing of witnesses. Some of these disputes will inevitably result in court proceedings, although DEFRA remains committed to resolving matters by mediation where appropriate.

In these circumstances it is not possible at present for reasons of legal and commercial confidentiality to disclose how much, if any, further money is owed.

Scrapie

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the contribution that she expects the Transmissible Spongiform Encephalopathies Regulations 2002 (S.I., 2002, No. 843) to make to the delivery of the National Scrapie Plan. [61550]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 13 June 2002]: The National Scrapie Plan is a long term programme aimed at breeding resistance to TSEs into the national sheep flock. Currently it runs on a voluntary basis. It is in no way affected by, or reliant upon, the powers available under the TSE (England) Regulations 2002, which make provision for the enforcement and administration of EU legislation on TSEs and consolidate previously existing domestic legislation.

Fallen Stock

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what assessment she has made of the impact on the competitiveness of British farmers of the existence within the EU of different levels of state aid for eliminating (a) fallen stock and (b) slaughterhouse waste; [61498]

(2) what her policy is towards state aid for the elimination of fallen stock; [61501]

(3) what plans she has to change her policies in response to the European Commission's working paper, Animal Waste and Fallen Stock—State Aid Policy Issues; [61497]

(4) what her policy is on the possible harmonisation or approximation of state aid for eliminating fallen stock within the EU; [61499]

(5) if she will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting held on 27 May between the European Commission and national Government experts on the disposal of animal wastes and fallen stock. [61591]

Mr. Morley [Holding answer 13 June 2002]: DEFRA officials attended a working group with EU counterparts and the Commission where the working paper "Animal Waste and Fallen Stock—State Aid Policy Issues" was discussed, with a view to ensuring consistency in the application of state aid rules relating to animal waste and fallen stock in all Member States. We support the harmonisation of government support given to industry for the disposal of animal wastes and fallen stock. The UK position is that the costs of the collection and disposal of livestock fallen on farm are the responsibility of the farming industry: an application of the so-called "polluter pays" principle.

Grass

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what area is planted to short rotation coppice and miscanthus grass in the UK; and if she will make a statement. [64126]

Margaret Beckett: 1,800 hectares of energy crops have been planted in the UK. This is primarily short rotation coppice but includes about 50 hectares of miscanthus. This Department has allocated support of £29 million to solid biomass crops through the Energy Crops Scheme, part of the England Rural Development Programme. Working with other Departments we have put in place schemes with funding of £70 million which will develop markets for biomass, including purpose grown energy crops and material from forests, in heat, combined heat and power and electricity generation. We are also working closely with the Countryside Agency which has launched the Community Renewables Initiative to help local communities develop renewable energy projects. The Renewables Obligation permits the co-firing of energy crops with fossil fuels. The Government have also welcomed the publication of the Energy Review by the Performance and Innovation Unit, which draws attention to the key role of renewable energy sources, including energy crops, in moving to a low carbon economy. Consultation on the key recommendations of the report will lead to a White Paper in the autumn.

Biomass Crops

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what public money has been spent in research and promotion in each of the past five years concerning (a) biomass energy crops and (b) biofuels for road transport; and if she will make a statement. [64119]

Margaret Beckett: This Department co-ordinates government research into biomass energy crops and total public expenditure amounts to approximately £2.75 million per annum and has been stable at this level over the last five years. The production technology for transport biofuels from UK grown crops is mature and this results in a low research spend. Expenditure by this Department in the current financial year amounts to £20,000 on work in support of policy development. Expenditure in the previous four years was nil, although the Department does have a large portfolio of research, costing about £6 million per annum, supporting the primary production of crops such as oilseed rape, wheat and potatoes which have the potential to be used for transport fuel production. It is not possible to separately identify the cost of promotion in respect of biomass energy crops and biofuels. The Department has included generic promotion of non-food crops in its work at agricultural shows. We have also organised and attended a small number of promotional meetings and seminars linked to the development of markets for solid biomass crops. The promotion of biomass crops also takes place through our work in support of the England Rural Development Programme, the Energy Crops Scheme forming one element of that programme.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will estimate the amount of carbon saved from 1 million tonnes of biodiesel and bioethanol substituted for the equivalent amount of fossil diesel and petrol; and if she will make a statement. [64128]

Margaret Beckett: The replacement of one million tonnes of fossil diesel with biodiesel from oilseed rape would save between 500,000 and 700,000 tonnes of carbon. Research into the production of bioethanol from starch or sugar crops generally indicates that slightly less carbon is saved through replacing petrol with bioethanol when compared with replacing fossil diesel with biodiesel. In the Budget my right hon. Friend the Chancellor confirmed the new duty rate for biodiesel set at 20 pence per litre below the rate for Ultra Low Sulphur Diesel. The Government have also launched a second round of the Green Fuel Challenge inviting bids for pilot projects for biofuels, including bioethanol, which would qualify for duty reductions. The Forum on the Non-Food Uses of Crops is studying the potential of biodiesel and bioethanol. The Government are considering carefully the recommendation of the Policy Commission on the Future of Farming and Food that duty on biofuels should be reduced to the rates applied to other clean fuels.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will estimate the amount of carbon saved in each of the last five years by the use of biomass crops grown in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement. [64127]

Margaret Beckett: One hectare of biomass crops yielding the equivalent of eight tonnes per annum has the potential to save about two tonnes of carbon each year. Achieving these carbon savings depends on functioning end markets for the utilisation of biomass crops. Most plantings of purpose grown energy crops have, to date, been to provide fuel for the Arbre biomass power station near Selby which expects to begin full operation later this year. In April the Government launched the Bioenergy Capital Grant Scheme which will develop markets for biomass, including purpose grown energy crops and material from forests, in heat, combined heat and power and electricity generation. Further funding will be available from a Community and Household Capital Grant Scheme which will be launched later this year. Officials are also working closely with the Local Support Teams set up by the Countryside Agency, through the Community Renewables Initiative, to develop markets for renewables.

Agricultural Shows

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the purpose was of the presence of the DEFRA stand at this year's agricultural shows; at which shows it appeared; and how she will assess its effectiveness. [63194]

Mr. Morley: The following list shows the venues at which a DEFRA information/exhibition stand has been or will be present.

The purpose of providing such a stand at these events is to provide information on the interests, responsibilities and activities of the Department. Other issues are covered depending on the location, theme and potential audience.

The cost-effectiveness of these events is kept under review by assessment of the numbers of visitors to the stand, the number of inquiries and/or requests dealt with and feedback from the show organisers.

Salmon

Lawrie Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the tonnage of farmed salmon in England was in each year since 1990; and what the average size of the fish produced was in each year. [63361]

Mr. Morley: Statistics for 1990 and 1991 are not currently available.

Farmed Atlantic salmon production in England between 1992 and 2001 primarily involves the production of juvenile fish for on-growing in Scottish marine fish farms and for re-stocking rivers. The juvenile fish concerned are fry, parr and smolts which, depending on their stage of growth have an average weight of between 1 gram and 30 grams. Details are as follows:

Juvenile Atlantic salmon production in England—1992 to 2001

	Juvenile fish
	Number (millions)	Estimated tonnes
1992	7.2	37
1993	5.7	35
1994	3.6	41
1995	6.8	44
1996	6.0	26
1997	8.6	39
1998	8.6	59
1999	14.4	98
2000	6.8	54
2001	7.6	36

There has also been farming of some six tonnes of adult fish (estimated average weight of three kilos) in the period mainly for broodstock and research purpose.

EU Management Committees

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the EU Committee on the implementation of the Directive establishing a Community policy regarding water is next due to meet; whether experts nominated by the Scottish Executive (a) have been and (b) are members; and if she will make a statement. [63928]

Mr. Meacher: Article 20 of Directive 2000/60/EC establishing a framework for Community action in the field of water policy provides that the regulatory committee established by Article 21(1) will assist the Commission in making any necessary technical adaptations to Annexes I, III and section 1.3.6 of Annex V to the directive, and in setting technical specifications and standardised methods for analysis and monitoring of water status. It may also assist the Commission in adopting guidelines on the implementation of Annexes II and V and in setting technical formats for transmission of statistical and cartographic data to the Commission.

The committee has not yet met, and no meeting has been arranged. However, the committee is due to meet at the latest by 22 December 2002. UK representation is likely to vary according to the agenda for each meeting and may include members of the Scottish Executive and other devolved Administrations where there are items of sufficient interest.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the EU Management Committees of the common organisations of agricultural markets for dehydrated fodder is next due to meet; what the UK representation is on it; whether experts nominated by the Scottish Executive (a) have been and (b) are members; and if she will make a statement. [63963]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), on 10 June 2002, Official Report, column 917W.

There is no set schedule of meetings for the Management Committee for Dehydrated Fodder. UK representation on this management committee depends on the agenda items under discussion. Officials from the Scottish Executive and other devolved Administrations attend as necessary in accordance with their interests. However, no representative of the Scottish Executive has attended the Management Committee for Dehydrated Fodder.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the EU Management Committees of the common organisations of agricultural markets for fresh fruit and vegetables are next due to meet; whether experts nominated by the Scottish Executive (a) have been and (b) are members; and if she will make a statement. [63965]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer given to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), on 10 June 2002, Official Report, column 912W.

The next meeting of the Fresh Fruit and Vegetables Management Committee is scheduled for 16 July 2002. UK representation on this committee depends on the agenda items under discussion. No representative of the Scottish Executive has attended.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether experts nominated by the Scottish Executive (a) have been and (b) are members of the EU Management Committees of the common organisations of agricultural markets for cereals; and if she will make a statement. [63964]

Mr. Morley: UK representation on the EU's Cereals Management Committee depends on the agenda items under discussion. Officials from the Scottish Executive and other devolved Administrations attend as necessary in accordance with their interests.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether experts nominated by the Scottish Executive have been members of the EU Committee for the adaptation to scientific and technical progress of the directive on methods of measurement and frequencies of sampling and analysis of surface water intended for the abstraction of drinking water in the member states; and if she will make a statement. [63947]

Mr. Meacher: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on 23 May 2002, Official Report, column 496W. No date has been set for the Committee to meet. UK representation would vary according to the agenda for each meeting and may include members of the Scottish Executive and other devolved administrations where there are items of sufficient interest.

Recycling

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) if she will make a statement about the availability of plastic recycling facilities (a) in England and (b) in Gloucestershire; [62067]

(2) what steps she is taking to increase plastic recycling facilities; and if she will make a statement. [62068]

Mr. Meacher: The Department does not keep a central record of recycling facilities. However, I understand that two local authorities in Gloucestershire collect plastic for recycling—Gloucester City Council and Stroud District Council. In addition, Stroud District Community Recycling group operates a kerbside collection of materials including plastic.

We have set statutory performance standards for recycling or composting household waste for each local authority in England. Authorities are required, on average, to double recycling by 2003–04 and triple it by 2005–06. Future targets for local authorities will be even more demanding and many authorities will need to begin collecting plastic for recycling in order to meet these targets. It is up to local authorities to decide how best to meet their recycling standards, depending on local circumstances such as housing type. However, the Government is taking various steps which should help boost plastic recycling and create more facilities.

Last year the Government set up the Waste and Resources Action Programme (WRAP), with £40 million of Government and Devolved Administration funding, to tackle the market barriers to increased recycling. WRAP has identified plastics as a priority area in its business plan to 2003–04 and they intend to award a grant to address the lack of plastics reprocessing infrastructure, which should result in an additional 20,000 tonnes per annum of post-consumer plastic bottles being diverted from the waste stream. New plastic reprocessing facilities will create more demand for local authorities to collect recyclable plastic.

I recently announced the arrangements for the distribution of the £140 million fund to assist local authorities in meeting their recycling targets. We expect this fund to go towards developing new and existing recycling schemes and in some cases money from the fund may well be used to extend collection schemes to include plastics. We have specifically earmarked a proportion of this funding for tackling more difficult waste streams such as plastic.

Waste Paper Exporters

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much was granted to waste paper exporters under the PERN system in each of the last two years. [63775]

Mr. Meacher: In 2001, PERN revenue to accredited exporters for paper packaging waste was £3.3 million. This compares with PRN revenue to accredited reprocessors for paper packaging waste of £32 million.

In 2000, PERN revenue to accredited exporters for paper packaging waste was £476,294. This compares with PRN revenue for accredited reprocessors of £15.5 million.

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the reasons underlying the Government's use of the packaging export recovery note. [63780]

Mr. Meacher: Packaging waste recovery notes (PRNs) and packaging waste export recovery notes (PERNs) are the main method for businesses obligated under the Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 1997 (as amended) to demonstrate compliance with their recovery and recycling obligations. These regulations implement the recovery and recycling targets in the EC Directive on Packaging and Packaging Waste 94/62/EC which has both environmental and single market objectives.

Under this directive, businesses with recovery and recycling obligations may carry out that recovery/recycling either in the UK or elsewhere, subject to the usual rules on the export of waste. In the same way, other countries may have their waste recycled by UK reprocessors.

The PERN system provides a method for obligated businesses to demonstrate compliance with their obligations when they have recycling carried out overseas. In terms of operation, the PERN system is the same as the PRN system in that those issuing the PERN or PRN are scrutinised by the agency before they can be accredited, the system deters fraud, and allows resources to be directed at investment in the infrastructural development needed to meet targets.

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the average value was of a packaging export recovery note in each of the last two years. [63777]

Mr. Meacher: In 2001, the average value of a packaging waste export recovery note (PERN) was, for the different packaging materials, as follows:

Material	Value
Aluminium	28
Steel	22
Paper	18
Glass	13
Plastic	24

Overall average per tonne was £20.

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the volume of waste paper exports was in each of the last two years under the PERN system. [63778]

Mr. Meacher: In 2001, 179,439 tonnes of paper packaging waste was exported. In 2000, 59,608 tonnes of paper packaging waste was exported.

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what representations she has received on shortfalls in waste paper and other raw materials necessary for domestic paper mills; and what steps the Government have taken to address them. [63779]

Mr. Meacher: The Confederation of Paper Industries have written to explain that they are experiencing difficulties in attracting sufficient quantities of paper/fibreboard packaging waste to UK mills. We are presently discussing this matter with other relevant Government Departments and will be discussing the way forward with the paper industry, with whom we are in regular touch.

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many packaging export recovery notes were granted in each of the last two years. [63776]

Mr. Meacher: In 2001, packaging waste export recovery notes (PERNs) were issued against 425,165 tonnes of packaging waste. In 2000, PERNs were issued against 315,841 tonnes of packaging waste.

Greenhouse Gases

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how large a reduction in global greenhouse gas emissions will be achieved by the current adherents to the Bonn Agreement. [63520]

Mr. Meacher: The emissions limitation or reduction commitments of developed countries listed in Annexe B to the Kyoto Protocol, excluding the United States and Australia who have said they will not ratify, are equivalent to a reduction in emissions of some 4.7 per cent. below 1990 levels from these countries during the first commitment period, 2008 to 2012. This represents about 1.5 per cent. of global emissions in 1990.

Flora and Fauna

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many plant and animal species have become extinct in the United Kingdom in the last 25 years. [63517]

Mr. Meacher: The Joint Nature Conservation Committee have advised that over the past 25 years 13 plant and animal species in total have become extinct. However, some species such as the large blue butterfly has been reintroduced successfully.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many (a) plant and (b) animal species are threatened with extinction in the United Kingdom. [63518]

Mr. Meacher: My scientific advisers on wildlife issues, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, have advised that there are about 489 plant species (including a significant proportion of rare lower plants) and 1,801 animal species (the majority of which are invertebrates) which are classified as endangered and threatened with the possibility of becoming extinct. The Department's second annual report, reviewing progress towards sustainable development in 2001 states that in 1997 16 per cent. of all invertebrates, 21 per cent. lower plant species and 11 per cent. of all vascular plants in the UK are considered nationally scarce.

Kyoto Protocol

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimate her Department has made of the economic cost to the United Kingdom of global warming if the Kyoto Agreement is not fully implemented by all signatory countries. [63509]

Mr. Meacher: The costs to Annex 1 parties, including the UK, of meeting their emissions reduction and limitation commitments under the Kyoto protocol have been estimated as a reduction of less than 0.7 per cent. of GDP in 2010 according to assessments assessed by the Inter-Government Panel on Climate Change. If countries do not fully implement their commitments, this will have an adverse effect on the scale of the global effort to tackle climate change which could result in greater adverse impacts. Given uncertainties, these are not possible to quantify.

Biodiversity

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps her Department is taking to protect biodiversity in the United Kingdom. [63514]

Mr. Meacher: The UK biodiversity action plan and subsequent individual action plans for 45 habitat and 391 species set out the measures to be taken to conserve biodiversity in the United Kingdom. The UK biodiversity group report "Sustaining the Variety of Life—5 Years of the UK Biodiversity Action Plan", published in March 2001 detailed progress on the plan and made recommendations for its further implementation. The Government expect to respond to the group's report and recommendations shortly.

Within the UK framework, responsibility for implementing the UK action plan now lies with the Scottish Executive, the National Assembly for Wales and the Northern Ireland Assembly. In the Rural White Paper "Our Countryside: the Future—A Fair Deal for Rural England" the Government announced it would prepare a biodiversity strategy for England. Work streams have been established covering the major sectoral policy areas impacting on biodiversity in England including, agriculture, forestry, water and wetlands, marine and coastal, urban and development, and business. In addition, there are workstreams for the cross-cutting themes of education and local and regional action. We expect to publish the strategy later this year.

Sewage

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her policy is on an international ban on disposal of sewage at sea. [63516]

Mr. Meacher: The International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution from Ships (MARPOL 73–78) has an Annex on Regulations for the Prevention of Pollution by Sewage from Ships. The UK ratified this Annex in 1995 and we are working to promote its entry into force.

The UK, other member states and those countries seeking accession to the European Union are, or will be, obliged to implement the requirements of several directives to protect the water and marine environment from land-based sewage discharges.

For example, the Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive requires by 2005 at least secondary treatment for all discharges to coastal waters from sewage treatment works serving more than 10,000 inhabitants. In England and Wales this level of treatment will be provided by the same deadline for coastal discharges from treatment works serving more than 2,000 inhabitants.

Furthermore the UK ceased sea dumping of sewage sludge (a by-product of treatment processes) in 1998 as required by the Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive. Such dumping is now banned in the north-east Atlantic under the OSPAR Convention. At the global level, the London Convention Protocol 1996 requires that sewage sludge may only be considered for disposal at sea following a detailed waste prevention audit, consideration of other waste management options and assessment of potential environmental impacts. The UK was one of the first countries to ratify the protocol and has been active in promoting its entry into force as soon as possible.

Egg Industry

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what regulatory impact assessment regarding costs to the egg industry has been made by her Department in the event of enriched cages being phased out before 2012. [65227]

Mr. Morley: A partial regulatory impact assessment on the effect of banning enriched cages from 2012 is being prepared and will form part of the public consultation exercise.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether enriched cages for the egg industry will be allowed to operate until 2012. [65229]

Mr. Morley: Yes. The forthcoming public consultation will be on a proposal to ban enriched cages from 2012.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she expects the research will be completed into bird welfare and bird behavioural aspects of enriched cages. [65228]

Mr. Morley: Research into systems of production is always ongoing. A specific DEFRA funded project on enriched cages will finish at the end of October 2003.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, pursuant to the statement of the Under-Secretary of State, Official Report, Fifth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation, 12 June 2002, c. 22, on the timescale for the operation of enriched cages if she will make a statement on the phasing out of enriched cages; and when the policy was decided. [65231]

Mr. Morley: A public consultation will start shortly on a proposal to ban enriched cages from 2012.

Public Bodies

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs which of the agencies and NDPBs sponsored by her Department have a regional organisation; and if she will list the counties and unitary authorities in each region in (a) 1997 and (b) 2002. [58935]

Mr. Morley: The Agencies and NDPBs sponsored by DEFRA with a regional organisation are listed as follows:

Food from Britain
Meat and Livestock Commission
Milk Development Council
Sea Fish Industry Authority
Agricultural Wages Board
Agricultural Wages Committee
Regional Flood Defence Committees
Agricultural Land Tribunals
British Wool Marketing Board
British Waterways
Countryside Agency
English Nature
National Forest Co.
Environment Agency.

A full listing of the counties and unitary authorities and the history of their generation is given at http: www.statistics.gov.uk/geography/countiesnonmetua.asp

World Food Summit

Mr. Laxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs in what ways the outcome of the recent World Food Summit in Rome will help combat the shortage of food in Southern Africa. [64802]

Clare Short: I have been asked to reply.

I do not consider that the meeting helped materially to combat food shortages in Southern Africa. UN organisations did, however, convene an action-oriented meeting of Governments, NGOs and donors in Johannesburg the previous week to discuss the crisis in the region.

Contaminated Land

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will place in the Library the results of the monitoring of arsenic, nickel, cadmium and mercury at industrial sites across the United Kingdom that her Department funded; and when she intends to publish the results. [64664]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Copies of the report entitled: "Monitoring of Lead, Arsenic, Cadmium, Nickel and Mercury around Industrial Sites" produced by Casella Stanger on behalf of the Department have been placed in the Library. The report was published on 4 September 2001. This report is also available electronically on the Air Quality Archive in the reports database at http://www.airquality.co.uk

Transmissible Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will place in the Library copies of the responses to her consultation on S.I. 2002–843. [61574]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 13 June 2002]: Responses to the consultation on the TSE (England) Regulations 2002 (S.I. 2002–843) are available from the DEFRA library at Whitehall Place. I will also place them in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

WALES

Oral Questions

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many oral questions he has transferred to other Departments in each of the last 18 months. [65505]

Mr. Paul Murphy: None.

Correspondence

Mr. Evans: ~~To ask~~ the Secretary of State for Wales how many letters have been received by each Minister in his Department since June 1997. [63496]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information is contained in the following table.

Letters received

Advertising Campaigns

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent on press and advertising campaigns in 2001–02; and what the planned expenditure is for 2002–03. [60909]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 15 April 2002, Official Report, column 752W.

Entertainment Costs

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what the cost was of the Department's 2001 staff Christmas party; and how many people attended. [61657]

Mr. Paul Murphy: There were two staff parties at Christmas 2001. Both were held outside core hours and neither involved any cost to the public purse.

Departmental Expenditure Limit

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much and what proportion of the departmental expenditure limit for 2002–03 will be accounted for by staff costs; what the figures were for 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [61034]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Running cost information for years up to 2001–02 is given at Annex 3 of the departmental report (Cm 5431). It is too early to provide a dependable forecast for 2002–03.

PRIME MINISTER

Hunting

Mr. Evans: To ask the Prime Minister how many representations he has received in support of hunting with hounds in the last 12 months. [63921]

The Prime Minister: I have received 4,770 campaign cards and 1,280 letters this year about the issue of hunting. My office has not broken them down into categories.

All representations to me on this issue since Thursday 21 March have been passed to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Rural Affairs who will consider them as part of the process he announced to the House.

Special Advisers

Mr. Evans: To ask the Prime Minister how many special advisers he has had since June 1997; and what plans he has to alter the number of special advisers working for him. [63967]

The Prime Minister: The information requested is as follows:

June 1997—18

June 1998—20

June 1999—23

June 2000—28

June 2001—22

June 2002—27.

Paragraph 50 of the "Ministerial Code" sets out the rules on numbers of special advisers. I do not anticipate any significant change in the numbers of special advisers in my office.

Cabinet Sub-Committee of Green Ministers

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Prime Minister what changes have taken place to the Cabinet Sub-Committee of Green Ministers as a result of the governmental reorganisation; and if he will make a statement. [65028]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (John Cryer) on 24 June 2002, Official Report, column 722W.

Mr. Alastair Campbell

Mr. Collins: To ask the Prime Minister whether Mr. Alastair Campbell is the accounting officer for the Central Office of Information. [64873]

The Prime Minister: No. The chief executive of the Central Office of Information is the accounting officer.

Mr. Collins: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on recent changes in the role of Mr. Alastair Campbell. [64875]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 28 February 2002, Official Report, column 1448W.

Balkans

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral statement of 24 June 2002, on the Seville European Council, if he will itemise the assistance the EU has given to the Balkans to which he was referring in his reply to the hon. Member for Linlithgow. [64741]

The Prime Minister: Between 1990 and 2000, the UK provided £74 million of bilateral assistance for reconstruction and development in the Balkans. This was in addition to the £1.7 billion provided by the EC, to which we contributed £330 million. Together with the £3 billion provided by the remaining EU member states, this amounts to a total EU contribution of £4.8 billion. Since 2000, up to the present date, the EC has committed a further £1.2 billion. In addition, we have allocated £40.6 million as a bilateral assistance since 2000.

The EU has also offered generous trade preferences. These allow tariff free access into EU markets for 95 per cent. of industrial and agricultural products.

Dublin Convention

Mr. Gale: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for North Thanet on 24 June 2002, Official Report, column 627, if he will indicate which article in the Dublin Convention supersedes the Sangatte Protocol; and if this assertion has been tested in law. [64871]

The Prime Minister: An agreement was signed with France dated 20 April 1995 in relation to the taking back of passengers who are refused admission on arrival in the UK ("the 1995 Agreement").

That agreement covers, among other things, the arrival of asylum seekers through the channel tunnel and therefore has the effect of qualifying the relevant provisions of the Sangatte Protocol of 25 November 1991.

The 1995 Agreement provided that, in relation to asylum seekers, it would be superseded by the relevant provisions of the Dublin Convention once that Convention entered into force. The Dublin Convention came into force on 1 September 1997. Therefore from that date, in relation to those claiming asylum, the provisions of the Dublin Convention prevail in so far as that Convention determines which state is responsible for deciding the claim.

We are not aware that this issue has ever been litigated.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Howard: To ask the Prime Minister which officials within his Office have responsibility for strategy on the single currency and related issues; and what their remit is. [64969]

The Prime Minister: Work on European Policy in my Office is headed by Sir Stephen Wall, working with other officials as necessary.

Rail Journeys

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Prime Minister what railway journeys he has taken, on official business, since 1997. [65580]

The Prime Minister: I last travelled by train on 1 June from Kings Cross to Darlington. I travel making the most efficient and cost-effective arrangements and will continue to use the railway service regularly when appropriate. My travel arrangements are in accordance with the arrangements for official travel set out in chapter 7 of the Ministerial Code, and the accompanying guidance document, Travel by Ministers.

Official Visits

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the (a) schools, (b) hospitals and (c) prisons which he has visited, with dates, since 1997. [65579]

The Prime Minister: Records of official visits are not held in this manner and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. I have undertaken a range of visits to schools, hospitals, universities, police stations, and visited a prison last year.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Youth Unemployment

14. Phil Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assessment his Department has made of the effect the new deal has had on youth unemployment. [63399]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Since 1997 youth unemployment has fallen by more than 40 per cent. to around its lowest level since the mid-1970s, and long-term youth unemployment has been virtually eradicated.

The New Deal for Young People has played an important part in this success. Up to March 2002 the programme had helped over 360,000 young people off benefit and into work. Independent research has found that, without the New Deal, long-term youth unemployment would have been about twice as high.

In my hon. Friend's constituency, nearly 400 young people have moved into jobs through the New Deal.

Carers

15. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions in what circumstances payments to carers for reimbursement of expenses for attending meetings are disregarded for benefit purposes. [63400]

Maria Eagle: All reasonable expenses incurred by a volunteer as a direct result of volunteering are disregarded.

A volunteer is defined as someone who performs a service and does not expect or receive payment other than expenses.

Disabled People

16. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the new deal for disabled people. [63401]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The new deal for disabled people is the first national employment programme to help people with disabilities move into and keep jobs, and is using innovative ways of helping them to achieve their full potential through work.

It is too early to make an assessment of the success of the programme. As new deal for disabled people progresses a comprehensive programme of evaluation will measure its effectiveness. This will include qualitative and quantitative research with all key stakeholders. A report of this evaluation will be published.

Action Team for Jobs

17. Jeff Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what impact the action team for jobs initiative is having in severely economically deprived areas. [63402]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Action teams are having a positive impact on the lives of disadvantaged people in the most economically deprived areas of the country. By the end of May they had helped over 34,000 people move into work. An early evaluation study also found that 80 per cent. of these jobs were sustained jobs.

The team working in my hon. Friend's constituency has helped over 320 jobless people into work since October 2001 and, last year, contributed £100,000 towards a new child care unit in the area.

Funded Pension Schemes

18. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions whether he will make a statement on his long-term plans for pensions policy if the present rate of take-up of funded pensions continues. [63403]

Mr. McCartney: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer I gave today to the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) at column 18.

Jobseeker's Allowance

19. Mr. Plaskitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what steps he is taking to ensure that those in receipt of jobseeker's allowance take up appropriate job offers. [63404]

Malcolm Wicks: It is a fundamental principle of our welfare reform programme to match rights with responsibilities.

For our part we are engaging actively with jobless people to provide them with employment opportunities. For example, our new deals for young people and 25 plus have already helped over 460,000 people to work—450 in my hon. Friend's constituency. And we plan to rollout a further 225 new jobcentre plus offices by spring of next year delivering a single, integrated service to people of working age, with a clear focus on work.

In return, we expect jobless people to take up these opportunities. For the minority who choose not to participate in the new deal, or who fail to take up suitable job offers, we have a rigorous sanctions regime to reduce or suspend their jobseeker's allowance. During 2001–02, just over 38,000 people were subject to a Jobseeker's Allowance sanction for refusing to take up an offer of employment.

Employment Zones

21. Mr. Mahmood: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of employment zones in reducing unemployment. [63406]

31. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of employment zones in reducing unemployment levels. [63418]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Employment Zones are one of a range of initiatives we have introduced to help people move into work.

The performance of the 15 Employment Zones is encouraging. By February this year they had helped over 22,000 long-term unemployed people from some of the country's most deprived areas into work.

We are currently evaluating the Zones and the results of this will feed into their ongoing improvement.

Private Pensions

22. Sandra Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to simplify the administration of private pensions. [63407]

Mr. McCartney: We are continually looking for ways to improve the pension system. As the hon. Lady will know, we have already made good headway in improving access to private pensions. For exmple, we have introduced stakeholder pensions which are a straightforward way for people to save for their retirement. So far, over 800,000 stakeholder pensions have been sold. We have also improved the way the minimum funding requirement operates in advance of its replacement.

But, of course we can do more. The current pensions regime is too complicated and that is in no-one's interest. So the Government have commissioned a number of reviews to look for ways of simplifying and improving pension provision and regulation. The Pickering review is looking at how we can cut red tape whilst making sure that scheme members are properly protected. Linked to this is the Quinquennial review of the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority (Opra) which is looking at how we can ensure that the regulatory rules we put in place are clearly understood by those who need to administer them and are well policed to ensure increased security and confidence. In addition, there is the Sandler review which is looking at how the commercial retail savings market might be made to operate more effectively and efficiently, to the benefit of consumers. The Inland Revenue is also carrying out a review of the tax treatment of occupational pensions and they will consult on proposals later in the year.

The Sandler and Pickering reviews will be published in the next few weeks with the Opra review publishing later in the year. We will consider the proposals in these reports once they are published as part of our deliberations on how best to simplify the administration of private pensions.

20. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what recent assessment he has made of the adequacy of private pension provision in the working population; and if he will make a statement. [63405]

27. Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to extend private pension provision in the UK. [63413]

Mr. McCartney: The introduction of stakeholder pensions has extended access of private pension provision. It is clear, however, that individuals are not saving enough and more action is needed. We have already made clear the Government's recognition of the importance of this issue and the actions we are taking to address is.

We have already extended access to private pensions in the UK with the introduction of stakeholder pensions and the requirement of employers to designate a scheme. Around 322,000 employes have already designated a stakeholder scheme and over 800,000 stakeholders have been sold. We are removing the disincentive to save for retirement that existed in the Social Security system with the introduction of the Pension Credit. We are also ensuring that individuals have the right information to make informed choices through the introduction of combined pensions forecasts, money purchase illustrations and our ongoing pensions education campaign.

There is a need to ensure that the regulatory system for pensions is appropriate and not unnecessarily complicated and that the retail savings market operates as it should. That is why we commissioned Alan Pickering to review pensions regulation and Ron Sandler to review the retail savings market. Both of these reviews are due to report shortly and we will respond to any proposals in the Autumn.

Jobcentre Plus

23. Brian White: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what types of personal advice users of Jobcentre Plus are entitled to receive. [63408]

24. Linda Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people are receiving services from Jobcentre Plus. [63409]

26. Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to make jobcentres more responsive to the needs of those who are out of work. [63412]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: In April this year we created Jobcentre Plus to bring together the Employment Service and the working age functions of the Benefits Agency. Jobcentre Plus provides a work focused service to all benefit claimants of working age, providing services to around five million people. Jobcentre Plus aims to deliver further improvements in customer service throughout its entire network of jobcentres and social security offices.

Jobcentre Plus provides a full range of advice on employment and training opportunities combined with comprehensive benefit advice. This advice is tailored to the individual needs of the people using the service and will help them to move from welfare to work while ensuring they have the support they need while doing so.

56 new Jobcentre Plus offices are already providing the fully integrated and work-focused service which we will extend progressively to cover the whole of Great Britain over the next four years. We have already announced that we plan to open around 225 more integrated offices by April 2003. As part of this upgrade to the service, everyone of working age who is making a new or repeat claim for benefit in these offices will participate in a work-focused interview with a Personal Adviser and be offered their continuing support.

28. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many benefit offices are Jobcentre Plus offices; and when it is expected to complete the changeover. [63415]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: In April this year we created Jobcentre Plus to bring together the Employment Service and the working age functions of the Benefits Agency. Jobcentre Plus provides a work focused service to all benefit claimants of working age, providing services to around five million people.

over the next four years. We have already announced that we plan to open around 225 more integrated offices by April 2003.

Final Salary Pensions

25. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what steps he is taking to assist employers administering final salary pension schemes. [63411]

Mr. McCartney: The Pickering Review of pensions regulation is looking at ways of simplifying the regulatory regime for pensions, in order to lessen the administrative burden on employers providing occupational pension schemes, including final salary schemes. This review is due to report in the next few weeks and we intend to respond to it in the Autumn. In addition, the Inland Revenue are undertaking a review of pensions taxation which is due to report later this year.

29. Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on final salary pension schemes. [63416]

Mr. McCartney: Final salary schemes have provided good pension provision for many individuals. They have been in decline since the 1960s and recently there has been an increase in the number of final salary schemes closing to new members. The reasons for this are complex, in particular that people are living longer which increases scheme liabilities, and that investment returns have been lower than in the past.

What is required is a regime that allows sustainable pension provision. It is Government's role to ensure that the right framework is in place. That is why we commissioned the review of pensions regulation by Alan Pickering that is due to report in the summer.

Biometric Benefit Entitlement Cards

30. Mike Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to introduce biometric benefit entitlement cards. [63417]

Malcolm Wicks: This Department has no plans to introduce biometric benefit entitlement cards.

Pension Service

33. Mr. Baron: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the Pension Service in meeting the needs of all pensioners. [63420]

Mr. McCartney: It is very early days yet but we are committed to making a real difference to the lives of pensioners.

The Pension Service, formally launched on 1 April 2002, will provide a modern, efficient and customer focused service, dedicated to combating poverty and encouraging saving for both today's and future pensioners.

It will comprise centralised pension centres working with an improved local service nationwide which will operate in the community working with local partners to provide face to face contact for pensioners. To date ten pension centres are starting to establish themselves along call-centre lines as planned.

A key aim of The Pension Service is to provide an excellent customer service by making use of the advances in new technology. This will be done through our call-centres. Customers can access us easily through a simple range of telephone numbers, and can get their claims and queries dealt with quickly by trained experts who understand state pensions and the needs of their customers.

We fully recognise that not everyone can access the service using the telephone, post or internet—and for those customers there will be a community based local service.

On current planning assumptions the local service is being introduced on a phased basis and should be in place nationwide by October 2002. It will be made up of two key elements. A direct local service, providing support directly to customers which will include a targeted visiting service both in the home and at third party locations, and a 'drop in' surgery service for outreach and take up activities; and partnership services provided with partners such as local authorities and voluntary sector organisations.

The Pension Service sees a key shift in emphasis from processes to people: their needs, what they want and the way they want it delivered. This improved service will be rolled out over the next few years. In the interim, our customers will continue to deal with their existing social security offices until they are contacted in writing about the new arrangements.

Workplace Training

34. Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what he is doing to encourage an increase in labour force skills by means of workplace training. [63421]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: We offer a range of work-based training opportunities to ensure that long-term unemployed and economically inactive people have the skills and experience they need to find and remain in work.

Work-based training is an important element in the New Deals and the Work-Based Learning for Adults programme. These offer participants real work experience with employers and the opportunity to develop job-related skills.

We are working closely with employers to ensure that their skill needs are met. For example, we are introducing Ambition programmes to enable people to gain the right skills through work experience and undertaking training designed by employers. Ambition programmes will engage with key sectors such as construction, retail, information technology and energy.

We, and colleagues at the Department for Education and Skills and the Department for Trade and Industry, have asked the Regional Development Agencies to lead in the development of the Framework for Regional Employment & Skills Action (FRESA). This strategic partnership of organisations includes Jobcentre Plus, the CBI, the TUC, the Learning and Skills Council and local authorities. FRESAs will promote a collaborative, proactive approach to employment and skills in regions.

They will give a clear focus to what is needed to ensure that each region has a wide range of job opportunities and a workforce with the skills employers require.

Child Benefit

35. Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to change the entitlements to child benefit. [63422]

Malcolm Wicks: As a consequence of the introduction of the Child Tax Credit and the transfer of the administration of Child Benefit to the Inland Revenue from April 2003, there are minor changes to the entitlement conditions of Child Benefit contained in the Tax Credit Bill currently before Parliament.

New Deal 50 Plus

36. Colin Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the new deal 50 plus. [63423]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: New deal 50 plus has been subject to a comprehensive programme of evaluation, including quantitative surveys and qualitative research. A number of research reports have been published, the most recent of which is a summary report published in December 2001 (Atkinson, J. Evaluation of the new deal 50 plus: Summary Report. ESR103, December 2001). Copies of the reports can be found in the Library.

Research findings show generally positive views about the programme from both clients and staff. The key element of the programme is seen to be the tax-free earnings top-up (Employment Credit). It has been successful in moving a high proportion of clients from benefits into employment. By the end of April 2002, nearly 70,000 people had claimed the Employment Credit.

Pensions

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, (1) pursuant to his answer of 16 May 2002, Official Report, column 849W, on pensions, what the average amount contributed to pension in 2001 was for each member covered by a funded pension arrangement; and if he will make a statement on his assessment of the adequacy of this amount; [64205]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 16 May 2002, Official Report, column 849W, on pensions, if the figures in Table 1 exclude contributions to unfunded occupational pension arrangements; and if the number of members in Table 3 includes members of unfunded occupational pension arrangements. [64204]

Mr. McCartney: Contributions to unfunded occupational pensions are excluded.

It is not possible to calculate reliably average contribution amounts per person. This is because relevant figures are not available from comparable data sources.

In my written answer to the hon. Member, 16 May 2002, Official Report, column 849W, I provided estimates of contributions to private pensions. These figures contained some transfers, as indicated in footnote 6 to table 1. But footnote 6 also stated 'Information on the amount of these transfers is not available.' However I am now advised by ONS that information on transfers is derivable and could be significant. The ONS are examining urgently the basis on which such figures could be reliably produced and published.

My answer of 16 May used figures published in ONS's MQ5 publication to estimate contributions to private pensions. Such contributions can also be estimated by using Inland Revenue figures on tax relief given on pension contributions and the average rates of this tax relief. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has provided details today in answer to a question from the hon. Member. The implication of the published Inland Revenue series is of a clear increase in the rate of contributions.

However, the statistical breakdown of figures relating to private pensions produced by either method is complex. ONS are carrying out an investigation to establish the best way to calculate and present such figures as a matter of priority. This work will include external experts. Until it concludes, estimates of the level of pension contributions will need to be treated with particular care.

Benefit Fraud/Error

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, pursuant to his answer of 12 March 2002, Official Report, column 859–60 ref 39869, how many cases of benefit fraud and claimant error there were in each of the relevant benefits in each year since 1995; [43819]

(2) what his estimate is of the number of cases of (a) fraud, (b) customer error and (c) official error in respect of (i) income support and (ii) jobseeker's allowance for 1999–2000 and 2000–01. [44960]

Malcolm Wicks: It is not possible to provide a breakdown of how many cases of benefit fraud and claimant error there were in each of the relevant benefits in each year since 1995. However, since 1999, fraud investigators have recorded the number of cases where benefit ceases, or a change in benefit occurs, following an investigation. These figures include both fraud and customer error cases (as well as a very small number of cases where an underpayment is discovered) but it is not possible to provide a breakdown. The figures, which cover investigations across all benefits administered by the Department, are in the table.

Number of cases where benefit rate changes following action by a fraud investigator

	Number
1999–2000	198,467
2000–01	182,569

Comparable figures are not available before 1999.

Separately, by means of the continuous Area Benefit Review/Quality Support Team exercise, the Department is able to provide estimates of the total number of cases of fraud, customer error and official error at any one time in Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance. Figures are given in the table below. There is a degree of overlap inherent in the sampling process between the estimates of numbers of customer error and official error in these figures, caused in part by the measurement methodology. These figures therefore cannot be added together, as the resulting figure would include double counting. This overlap had no impact on the final published results for the estimated overall value of monetary loss as analysts made compensatory adjustments, reducing the figures by around 1 per cent. of expenditure.

The average levels of monetary loss in cases of customer and official error are lower than those in fraud cases, as shown in the table.

Estimate of number of cases of fraud and error and average weekly incorrectness in Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance

1999–2000 Data	Fraud	Average value of incorrectness per week £	Customer error	Average value of incorrectness per week £	Official error	Average value of incorrectness per week £
Income Support	216,000	51	301,000	13	493,000	18
Jobseeker's Allowance	120,000	44	32,000	17	125,000	27
2000–2001 Data
Income Support	204,000	55	296,000	14	476,000	17
Jobseeker's Allowance	86,000	47	20,000	15	86,000	25

Notes:

1. The average values represent the average weekly value of fraud or error (overpayment and underpayment) for cases where there is fraud or error (not average error per case on the live load).
2. Figures are presented as weekly values of incorrectness because the total value of an error over all the weeks it lasted is not available.
3. The figures are estimates based on samples, and as such are subject to sampling error; none of the changes between 1999–2000 and 2000–01 are statistically significant.
4. The figures for fraud, customer error and official error cannot be added together. They apply to different groups of cases, and in the case of official error, there is overlap with customer error in the definition of error.

Area Benefit Review/Quality Support Team.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how much the Government have spent on advertising (a) the Targeting Fraud Hotline and (b) other campaigns to report benefit fraud in each of the last 10 years. [53749]

Malcolm Wicks: There is no Targeting Fraud Hotline. The information available on the amount spent on advertising the National Benefit Fraud Hotline is in the table.

	£ Amount
1996–97	476,000
1997–98	225,000
1998–99	290,247
1999–2000	337,672
2000–01	425,178
2002–03	0 to date

The Targeting Fraud campaign is part of our long-term strategy to reinforce our message that benefit fraud is wrong, unfair and will not be tolerated. Expenditure on the pilot phase of the campaign was £2.2 million spanning the financial years 1999–2000 and 2000–01. The success of the pilot campaign led to the launch of the national Targeting Fraud campaign. The initial spell of advertising in March 2001 cost £4.6 million and £8.9 million was spent on the campaign running from September 2001 to March 2002.

Information is not available on the amount spent on other advertising campaigns prior to 1997.

Departmental Helplines

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will list the targets for each of his Department's telephone helplines, with performance figures for each helpline for the last year for which figures are available. [56416]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The table shows the performance of the Department's telephone helplines against their internal performance targets for the last year for which figures are available (to March 2002 except where otherwise indicated).

Most lines are expected to answer a set percentage of calls within a specified number of seconds and this is the measure given in the table; but some operate different targets and, where applicable, this is shown in the notes.

[1] 85 per cent. of calls to be answered first time ie where the customer gets through on the first attempt without having to ring back again.

[2] No more than 20 per cent. of calls to be abandoned (abandoned calls are those where the customer hangs up before getting a reply).

[3] 99 per cent. of calls offered (that is those reaching the switchboard) are to be answered within three seconds. A facility administered by an outside organisation is available to take overflow calls.

[4] 65 per cent. of all calls are to be answered.

[5] These are new services for which a full year's data are not yet available.

[6] No more than 5 per cent. of calls are to be abandoned after 20 seconds.

[7] Calls automatically answered after three rings.

[8] To be answered.

[9] No more than 80 per cent. of calls should be ineffective (ineffective calls are those that receive the engaged tone, receive a network message from BT or are abandoned).

[10] These centres are administered by outside organisations. In addition to the numbers of calls answered first time, they have to be answered within an average of 10 seconds.

[11] Line outsourced to another provider from 7 March 2002.

Child Poverty

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what contribution increases in child benefit have made to reducing the numbers of children living in poverty over the past five years. [57952]

Malcolm Wicks: Child poverty and social exclusion are complex, multi-dimensional concepts, affecting many aspects of children's lives. The third opportunity for all report (Cm 5260) sets out the Government's strategy for tackling child poverty and social exclusion and presents information on the indicators used to monitor progress against this strategy.

As part of this strategy, since 1997 there have been significant increases in child benefit—the rate for the first child has increased by over 25 per cent. in real terms.

Computers

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many computers were replaced in his Department in each of the past three years; how the replaced units were disposed of and by which companies; and at what cost. [60744]

Malcolm Wicks: The Department for Work and Pensions is a new Department formed in June 2001. The new Department encompasses the former DSS (and its Executive Agencies) and the former Employment Service (ES). While the new Department is currently converging the IT infrastructure of these two former Departments, the information requested is shown against the relevant Department which originally purchased the equipment.

Employment Service (ES)

On 1 August 1998 the Employment Service (ES) entered into a partnership agreement with EDS (Electronic Data Systems) for provision of all IT and Telephony services. This included the replacement of 41,000 desktop computers during the period October 2000 to March 2002. The replaced units were donated by EDS to Paces, a charitable organisation based in Sheffield. The cost of disposal cannot be separately identified as this formed an integral part of a commercial agreement to provide new equipment.

Department of Social Security (DSS)

As part of the Government's modernisation agenda, the Early Office Infrastructure (EOI) Project is currently in the process of implementing in excess of 100,000 PCs across the former DSS estate. The vast majority of computers being provided are replacing dumb terminals with no commercial value. Rollout of computers commenced in August 2001 and is due to be complete by December 2002. Approximately 60,000 computers have been deployed in this period. Disposal of IT equipment is handled by the Ministry of Defence Disposal Services Agency.

Prior to the commencement of the EOI Project, ICL Multi-Vendor Computing disposed of computers in the former DSS. The contract allowed ICL to dispose of Computers at no cost to the Department, unless the contractor could demonstrate that the cost of disposal exceeded revenue generated by resale. Details of computers purchased in this period are shown in the table:

Year
1999–2000	20,270
2000–01	5,825
2001–02	3,748

Child Support

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to allow the Child Support Agency to impose deduction from earnings orders on service personnel; and if he will make a statement. [60768]

Malcolm Wicks: None.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to review the Child Support (Collection and Enforcement) Regulations 1992 with regard to service personnel; and if he will make a statement. [60767]

Malcolm Wicks: None.

Antisocial Tenants

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what representations he has received on the proposal to give local authorities the power to reduce housing benefit for antisocial tenants; and if he will place related correspondence in the Library. [60442]

Malcolm Wicks: The idea of withholding people's housing benefit if their behaviour is persistently anti-social was raised in a Bill put before this House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field).

We believe in the principle that rights should be matched by responsibilities and support the underlying objectives of the Bill. We are currently considering how the Bill could be put into a workable format.

We have received some representations about the Bill. However, it would be inappropriate to publish the few letters received, as they are not in response to public consultation.

Verification Framework

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) of 15 April 2002, Official Report, column 699W, if he will provide a breakdown for the estimated figure of £100 million of net savings from the introduction of the verification framework. [61383]

Basic State Pension

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what would be the value of the basic pension for (a) a single pensioner and (b) married couple (i) if the link to average earnings or prices had not been repealed and (ii) if the pension had been increased in line with average earnings since then. [61151]

Mr. McCartney: The information requested is set out in the table. Our priority is to ensure that all pensioners have a decent and secure income in retirement and to share fairly in the rising prosperity of the country. The basic state pension will remain the foundation of income in retirement. To achieve this, we have increased the basic state pension over the last two years above the level of RPI and we have provided extra help for pensioners through the minimum income guarantee, winter fuel payments and free TV licences for the over-75s. We have given a guarantee that the basic state pension will be increased by at least £100 a year for single pensioners and £160 for couples in 2003–04 and in future years by 2.5 per cent. or the increase in the September retail prices index, whichever is the higher.

Compared with the 1997 system, an average pensioner household will be £840 a year better off and around 1.8 million of the poorest pensioner households will be over £1,000 a year better off, and the Government will be spending an extra £6 billion a year in real terms on pensioners this year. This £6 billion includes £2.5 billion more on the poorest third of pensioners, which is three times more than an earnings link since 1998 would have given them.

	£ per week
	Single	Couple
Basic state pension at November 1979	23.30	37.30
Actual amount in April 2002	75.50	120.70
Amount in April 2002 if up-rated by higher of RPI/earnings	105.70	169.00
Amount in April 2002 if up-rated with average earnings	102.60	164.20

Notes:

1. Rates are taken from November 1979 as the earnings link was broken in November 1980.
2. The retail prices index (all items) has been used as published by the Office for National Statistics.
3. Average Earnings Index Whole Economy (non-seasonally adjusted) has been used as published by the Office for National Statistics.
4. Figures have been rounded to the nearest five pence at each uprating.

Alignment Payments

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many alignment payments were awarded in each of the last 10 years; what the expenditure on alignment payments was in each of those years; and if he will make a statement. [62001]

Malcolm Wicks: Social Fund alignment payments provide valuable help to people awaiting their first payment of wages on taking up work. They can also help people with essential day-to-day living expenses in advance of their first payment of benefit.

The information is in the table.

Social Fund crisis loan alignment payments

Year	Number of payments	Expenditure (£ million)
1992–93	226,737	9
1993–94	273,171	11
1994–95	326,864	13
1995–96	366,865	14
1996–97	[1]344,737	14
1997–98	[1]398,731	17
1998–99	[1]433,851	20
1999–2000	474,076	23
2000–01	476,936	24
2001–02	486,031	27

[1] Technical problems with Social Fund Policy, Budget and Management Information System mean that figures for the years 1996–97 to 1998–99 may be subject to a margin of error of 5 per cent to 10 per cent. and should therefore be treated as a guide only.

Notes:

1. Expenditure figures are rounded to the nearest £ million.
2. Awards including alignment payments may include other items.

Carers Allowance

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions whether persons over 65 who are to receive carers allowance will receive it in addition to their pensions. [62390]

Maria Eagle: Retirement pension (RP) and invalid care allowance (ICA) are income maintenance benefits. The former provides income replacement for those who have reached pensionable age, while the latter provides a measure of financial support for those who have given up the opportunity of full-time paid employment in order to care for a severely disabled person. It is a basic principle of the social security system that only one such benefit can be paid at any time because to pay both of them in full at the same time would amount to duplicate provision for the same need.

The Regulatory Reform (Carer's Allowance) Order 2002, made on 29 May 2002, will enable older carers with little or no retirement pension to receive invalid care allowance, while those with low incomes will benefit by gaining access to the carer premium worth £24.80 a week, paid with income-related benefits such as the minimum income guarantee. This follows the substantial increases to the carer premium and to the earnings limit for entitlement to invalid care allowance made in April 2001.

There are no plans to change these arrangements.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Alan Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many applicants for DLA were (a) granted on first application, (b) rejected on first application and did not appeal, (c) granted on appeal and (d) rejected on appeal in each of the last five years. [63502]

Maria Eagle: Information is not available in the form requested. The available information is in the following tables.

Outcomes of first applications for disability living allowance in each of the last five years

Year	Successful applications	Unsuccessful applications[1]
1997–98	211,200	255,700
1998–99	175,600	208,200
1999–2000	181,000	190,400
2000–01	211,300	206,100
2001–02[2]	171,200	158,000

West Pilton Post Office

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) when officials at the Benefits Agency were first informed of suspected fraud at West Pilton post office in Edinburgh; [63481]

(2) when officials at the Benefits Agency expect to conclude their investigations into suspected fraud at West Pilton post office in Edinburgh; [63484]

(3) what allegations led officials at the Benefits Agency to investigate fraud at West Pilton post office in Edinburgh. [63479]

Malcolm Wicks: In line with part 2 paragraph 4 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information we do not discuss information about on-going investigations.

Lone Parents

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how work is defined in relation to the target of getting 70 per cent. of lone parents into work. [64123]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The lone parent employment rate is calculated using the Labour Force Survey (LFS) definition of employment. This definition includes anyone aged 16 or over who does at least one hour's paid work in the week prior to their LFS interview, or who has a job that they are temporarily away from (for example because they are on holiday). Also included are people who do unpaid work in a family business and people on Government-supported employment training schemes, in line with ILO definitions.

Criminal Offences

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, pursuant to his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), of 20 May 2002, Official Report, column 46W, on criminal offences, which offences have been (a) created, (b) abolished and (c) redrafted. [64209]

Malcolm Wicks: Sections 13 and 14 of the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997 created six new offences (four triable in the Crown court or magistrates court and two offences triable in the magistrates court) by adding new sections 112(1A) and 111A(c) and (d) to the Social Security Administration Act 1992. Section 13 of the Child Support Pensions and Social Security Act 2000 creates three new offences relating to information required to be furnished to a child support officer.

The offences in sections 112A and 111A(c) and (d) were redrafted and substituted for the previous ones by the Social Security (Fraud) Act 2001 because of difficulty in drafting linked regulations sufficiently precisely to be workable. Section 19 of the Social Security (Fraud) Act repeals the previous provisions.

New offences created by the Jobseekers Act 1995 were brought within the scope of the offences in the 1992 Act and the original provisions were consequentially repealed by schedule 1 para 4 and schedule 2 to the 1997 SSA (Fraud) Act.

Benefits (Scotland)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, pursuant to his answer of 13 June 2002, Official Report, column 1422W on benefits, how many people in Scotland are in receipt of (a) income support, broken down by parliamentary constituency and (b) council tax benefit and housing benefit, broken down by local authority area. [63972]

Malcolm Wicks: The available information has been placed in the Library.

National Insurance (Reduced Rate)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will list the contributory benefits to which married women paying the reduced rate of national insurance contributions would have been entitled to in each year since 1972. [65295]

Mr. McCartney: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Paymaster General on 10 June 2002, Official Report, columns 838–39W.

Widows and Widowers' Benefits

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what steps he is taking to ensure that widows and widowers are informed of their entitlement to widows and widowers' benefits. [63414]

Malcolm Wicks: We recognise that at the time of a spouse's death it is important for a bereaved person to know about the full range of benefits that he or she may be entitled to.

Information about benefits that may be claimed is made available in a variety of ways. In the case of bereavement benefits, since March 2001 the Department has issued leaflets to doctors' surgeries, post offices and support organisations. Articles explaining the new benefits were placed in a variety of magazines prior to their introduction in April 2001. As with other benefits, information and a claim form can also be accessed through a number of Government internet sites.

TRANSPORT

Ministerial Salaries

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the annual cost was of ministerial salaries in his Department in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 2001–02. [60939]

Mr. Jamieson: The level of ministerial salaries are recommended by the Senior Salaries Review Body. From May 1997, in the Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions there were two Cabinet Ministers, at an annual salary of £43,991; three Ministers of State, at an annual salary of £31,125; and four Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, at an annual salary of £23,623. From June 2001, in the Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions there was one Cabinet Minister, at an annual salary of £68,157; three Ministers of State, at an annual salary of £35,356 and three Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, at an annual salary of £26,835.

Advertising

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much was spent on press and advertising campaigns in 2001–02; and what the planned expenditure is for 2002–03. [60911]

Mr. Jamieson: Details of media expenditure incurred by the then DTLR on press and advertising campaigns for the period 2001–02, together with planned expenditure by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Transport for the period 2002–03, is:

Expenditure	Advertising—media spend (£ million)
2001–02	13.85
2002–03[1]	9.2

[1] Estimated

Of the 13.85 million spent last year most expenditure was on safety campaigns with £8.6 million spent on road safety and £2.25 million on fire safety. £1.2 million was also spent on promoting travel line.

Transport Costs

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the cost of (a) rail, (b) bus and (c) car travel in (i) large cities, (ii) other towns and cities and (iii) rural areas in pounds per kilometre in (A) 1997 and (B) 2001. [61286]

Mr. Spellar: The estimated average cost per passenger for travel per kilometre by rail, bus and car is as follows:

	1996–97	2000–01
(a) Rail
London Underground	0.13	0.15
National Rail	0.08	0.09
(b) Bus
London buses	0.13	0.14
English met area buses	0.12	0.13
English shire buses	0.14	0.17
(c) Car
All motoring[1]	0.10	0.14

[1] Includes expenditure on purchase of vehicles spares, repairs, insurance, taxation, fuel, parking.

Figures for bus and rail travel have been estimated by dividing total revenue from passenger fares (including revenue from payments for concessionary fares) by the total number of passenger kilometres travelled. They therefore represent an average cost to passengers over all journeys made, and do not necessarily reflect the cost for any individual journey.

Figures for car travel have been estimated by dividing household expenditure on motoring and fuel by the estimated total number of passenger kilometres travelled by car, by those living in households.

For rail and car it is not possible to split the revenue/expenditure and passenger figures by area type—a single journey may cover a number of different areas.

Figures are in current prices.

10-year Plan

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (a) public investment, (b) public resource expenditure, (c) private resource expenditure and (d) private investment is expected under the 10-year plan for (i) road building and (ii) road maintenance broken down by road type; and if he will make a statement. [64132]

Mr. Jamieson: The requested information is set out in the tables.

10-year plan public spending on roads: 2001–02 to 2010–11, £ billion, outturn prices

	Road building	Road maintenance	Other expenditure	Total expenditure
Strategic
Public investment	7.1	4.3	2.2	13.6
Public resources	3.9	2.8	2.2	8.9
Local
Public investment	1.3	9.6	0.0	10.9
Public resources	0.9	19.0	0.0	19.8
London
Public investment	2.2	0.0	0.0	2.2
Public resources	0.0	2.6	0.0	2.6
Total	15.4	38.2	4.4	58.0

10-year plan private investment on roads: 2001–02 to 2010–11, £ billion, outturn prices

	Road building	Road maintenance	Other expenditure	Total expenditure
Strategic	2.6	0.0	0.0	2.6
Local	2.4	0.0	0.0	2.4
Total	5.0	0.0	0.0	5.0

Note:

Figures may not total due to rounding.

No assumptions were made in the plan about the level of private resource expenditure, or about the breakdown of public expenditure and private investment between road types.The actual level of spending on roads in London will be a matter for the London Mayor.

Correspondence (Wales)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many written representations his Department has received from people in Wales since June 1997. [64546]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department does not hold central records relating to the number of written representations received from people in Wales.

Noise Mitigation (Biggleswade)

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for the funding within this financial year of noise mitigation measures along the stretch of the A1 known as the Biggleswade by-pass; and if he will make a statement. [64912]

Mr. Jamieson: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Tim Matthews, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Tim Matthews to Mr. Alistair Burt, dated 1 July 2002:

I have been asked by the Transport Minister, David Jamieson, to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about noise mitigation on the Biggleswade Bypass.

In line with the Government's aim, set out in the 10 Year Plan, of reducing noise for the motorway and trunk road network, Biggleswade Bypass was resurfaced with noise reducing materials in November 2000.

Although we have no plans for further noise mitigation measures in this financial year (2002/03) we do recognise that there is a case for further mitigation measures. But our priority is to deal with those sites announced in the House of Commons on 11 November 1999, and known as the Hansard List, by 2004/05. We will look at other sites, such as Biggleswade Bypass after that.

Special Needs Transport

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to develop a system of special needs transport in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [65055]

Mr. Jamieson: At the local level English authorities outside London are required to develop five-year local transport plans to tackle the transport issues faced by their communities. Our guidance on LTPs makes clear the importance of improving public transport and the vital role of voluntary and community transport in bringing benefits and better mobility for all sections of society through the provision of door-to-door and other specialised services.

Non-profit making organisations may use permits issued under section 19 of the Transport Act 1985. This enables them to run, among other things, special needs transport without the need to meet the requirements of bus operator licensing.

Safety Risk Assessments

Albert Owen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many safety risk assessments, in accordance with the Health and Safety at Work Act, have been carried out by (a) county highways authorities on county roads in England and Wales and (b) the Highways Agency on motorways and trunk roads to identify the number of locations where roads cross railway lines since the Selby train crash; and what action the authorities have taken to prevent accidents at the locations identified. [65219]

Mr. Jamieson: The Health and Safety at Work Act 1974 places a general duty on employers to conduct their undertaking in such a way as to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, the health and safety of the public. In general, this is not enforced where public and worker safety is adequately protected by a more specific and detailed law enforced by another authority, such as the Highways Act 1980 and the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984.

We have endorsed the risk ranking guidance produced by Railtrack and the CSS (formerly the County Surveyors' Society) and have commended it to highway authorities and rail infrastructure authorities. Details of risk assessments and any measures installed as a result are not held centrally.

Learning to Drive

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many responses the Department received to the consultation document, "Introducing a More Structured Approach to Learning to Drive". [65047]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 24 June 2002, Official Report, column 669W to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz).

Vehicle Registration

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the DVLA vehicle register will provide on request details of country of registration of coaches used for school trips. [65066]

Mr. Jamieson: The DVLA vehicle register contains information about all vehicles used or kept on public roads in Great Britain. The fact that a vehicle has been previously registered—for example, in a different country—is recorded on the register and shown on the vehicle registration document. This fact would be disclosed on request. Details of where a vehicle was previously registered are not recorded.

Sangatte Refugee Camp

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the cost will be to the Strategic Rail Authority of strengthening the perimeter fence between the Sangatte refugee camp and the entrance to the channel tunnel. [65743]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) will contribute towards the cost of the works in progress to increase security at the Fréthun rail freight terminal, adjacent to the channel tunnel, in order to enable early resumption of full and reliable rail freight services through the channel tunnel. The works will cost around £5 million in total. The amount of the SRA contribution is still to be settled.

Railways (Financial Support)

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what the criteria are for determining whether money paid to the railway industry by (a) the Office of the Rail Regulator and (b) SRA is subject to state aid approval from the EU; [65290]

(2) what the criteria are for determining whether money paid by the Government to the (a) Office of the Rail Regulator and (b) SRA is subject to state aid approval from the EU. [65291]

Mr. Jamieson: Apart from receiving money for its own administration, the Office of the Rail Regulator is not involved in receiving or paying out money. Any financial support provided to the railway industry by the SRA is compared with the EC state aid rules. Financial support that constitutes or may constitute a state aid, and is not covered by an existing state aid approved scheme, is notified to the Commission.

Bradford Forster Square to King's Cross Service

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reason the frequency of the Bradford Forster Square to King's Cross service has been reduced to two journeys each way per day. [65230]

Mr. Jamieson: Great North Eastern Railway's Passenger Service Requirement, which is a key part of their Franchise Agreement, requires them to provide two services each weekday between London King's Cross and Bradford and one in the opposite direction. The new Summer Timetable does, however, provide an additional 11 daily trains between London and Leeds offering connections to Bradford.

Public Transport (Safety)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for the compulsory fitting of seat belts on coaches used to transport pupils to and from school. [65787]

Mr. Jamieson: Since 1998 all coaches specifically used to transport pupils to and from school have been required to be fitted with seat belts.

Coastguard Helicopter Services

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what changes are proposed for coastguard helicopter services on the south coast. [65719]

Mr. Jamieson: Contracts for the provision of search and rescue helicopter services along the south coast will continue until they expire in May 2003. The future location of the helicopter that is currently based at Portland remains under discussion between the Maritime and Coastguard Agency and the South West Regional Development Agency.

Iwade-Queenborough A249

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce the winning consortia for the Iwade-Queenborough A249 improvements; and if he will make a statement. [65594]

Mr. Jamieson: I expect the contract for this project to be awarded in the late summer of 2003.

Road Tax

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much revenue he expects to be lost on unpaid vehicle road tax in 2002. [65788]

Mr. Jamieson: A roadside survey of vehicle excise duty evasion is currently taking place and the results will be known in the autumn.

The last such survey took place in June 1999. This showed the level of VED evasion as 3.9 per cent. of revenue due. This equated to £191 million in 2001–2. This was offset by £110 million recovered through enforcement activities.

Bus Fuel Duty Rebate

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, column 774W, on bus fuel duty rebate, what was the last occasion on which he received a representation with regards the fuel duty rebate; from whom this was received and what changes were suggested; and what the timetable is to take forward the review of bus subsidies. [66068]

Mr. Jamieson: The most recent representation we have received is a letter dated 29 May from BP Oil UK Ltd. This drew attention to the current trials of diesel emulsion fuel in London and proposed either the equalisation of the fuel duty rebate rate paid on that fuel with the rate paid on ordinary diesel or the replacement of the rebate by a payment on a per mile basis.

The review of bus subsidies will start this month and is due to be completed by the end of February 2003.

Urban Bus Challenge Fund

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the projects being operated as a result of the Urban Bus Challenge Fund, giving (a) the start date of the project, (b) the project location and (c) the money attributed to each project. [64965]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The results of the first Urban Bus Challenge competition were announced on 2 November 2001 Official Report, column 923W-924W. This involved awards to 24 local authorities for 32 separate schemes, details of which have been placed in the Libraries of the House. 27 of these schemes have commenced and the remainder are due to be started by the local authorities concerned this financial year.

Bus Punctuality

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the bus punctuality figures for each of the last six years for (a) local buses including London, (b) local buses excluding London, (c) local London buses and (d) non-local buses. [64966]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Information is not available in the form requested.

Road and Rail Intersections

Albert Owen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport in how many locations (a) motorway and trunk roads and (b) country roads in England and Wales cross railway lines. [65220]

Mr. Jamieson: The report of the Highways Agency Working Group "To Review the Standards for the Provision of Nearside Safety Fences" gives the following figures for the number of road over rail bridges:

	England	Wales
Motorways	198	24
All purpose trunk roads	313	64
Local roads	3,955	299
	4,466	387

The figures for local road bridges over 'live' railway lines is based on replies from CSS Area Bridge Conference members as at 8 August 2001, not all replies having been completed.

Road Studies

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer of the right hon. Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers) of 10 April 2002, Official Report, column 103W, on the M4, if he will similarly list, by road number, the studies initiated by his Department and other Government agencies covering all or part of each road making up the Strategic Road Network, including (a) multi modal, (b) Highways Agency and (c) other studies. [64964]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The following studies initiated by my Department on the trunk road network have been or are being taken forward:

(a) Multi-modal studies

Multi modal studies take a broad view of significant issues affecting transport corridors across all the modes, and are proposing major investments in roads and public transport. The main trunk roads within the study areas are listed below:

A21/A27/A258: Access to Hastings

A14: CHUMMS—Cambridge to Huntingdon

M60/A6: SEMMMS—South-East Manchester

M6/M5/M42: West Midlands area

M6: MIDMAN—West Midlands to North-West

A453: (M1-Nottingham)

M18/M62/M1/A1: SWYMMS—South and West Yorks Motorway Box

A1/A19: TAMMS—Tyneside area

M1/A52: North/South movements in East Midlands

M25: ORBIT—Transport Solutions Around London

M4/M5/A303: SWARMMS—London to South-West and South Wales

A63: Hull Corridor

Route Management Strategies

The principal aim of route management strategies is to develop, in consultation with the public and other stakeholders, 10-year action plans for the HA's management of trunk roads and motorways within the frameworks established by regional transport strategies.

(c) Other studies

At any one time the Highways Agency as part of the day-to-day management of the trunk road network is progressing, and contributing to, numerous other studies concerned with development pressures, safety issues, or other matters affecting the operation of motorways and trunk roads.

Buses

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many low-emission buses were introduced in each of the last five years, broken down by type of (a) fuel and (b) engine that cause the lower emissions [64968]

Mr. Jamieson: To help reduce traffic pollution, low-emission buses and other heavy vehicles are eligible for lower 'reduced pollution certificate' (RPC) rates of Vehicle Excise Duty. The numbers of buses being registered in the last five years and qualifying for RPCs, broken down by fuel/engine type, are as follows:

	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001
Petrol	0	0	0	6	2
Diesel	29	122	385	583	429
Gas	23	7	30	12	5
Total	52	129	415	601	436

Road Safety

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people in each of the last five years for which figures are available have been killed as a result of motorists driving under the influence of (a) alcohol and (b) drugs; what new proposals he has to stop (i) drink and (ii) drug driving; and if he will make a statement. [64717]

Mr. Jamieson: The information requested is in the following table.

Estimates of road users killed in accidents where one or more drivers were above the legal limit

	Number
1996	580
1997	550
1998	460
1999	460
2000[1]	520

[1] Provisional

National road accident statistics do not identify cases where drivers involved were under the influence of drugs.

Publicity remains a major factor in combating drink driving. We are moving to a year round more diversified campaign involving a wide variety of media. With respect to drugs, we are considering the best way of targeting advice to potential users about the dangers of driving after taking drugs.

We intend also to strengthen enforcement by giving the police the power to undertake roadside evidential breath-testing and, where appropriate, to take blood samples from unconscious subjects in hospital. We are monitoring the impact of the new police drug recognition and impairment tests and also intend to take legislative powers to enable the police to require suspect drivers to undertake roadside tests which, could include specialised drug detection devices if they become available.

Roads (North-West)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for new road schemes in the north-west; and if he will list those schemes, giving in each case the (a) cost and (b) commencement date. [64540]

Mr. Jamieson: The planned new road schemes in the Government's targeted programme of improvements that are not yet at the construction stage in the north-west are as follows. (The TPI is a programme of major road improvements announced in July 1998 in support of the Integrated Transport White Paper 'A New Deal for Transport'.)

Scheme and brief details	Estimated cost (£ million)	Start of Works
M60 Motorway Junctions 5 to 8 Widening. Widening the motorway from the present dual two and three lane carriageways to dual three and four lane carriageways with associated improvements to junctions.	80	2003–04
A595 Parton to Lillyhall. Upgrading the route between Parton and Lillyhall, including improvements to junctions, and a dual carriageway bypass of the villages of Distington and Howgate.	17.7	2005–06
A66 Temple Sowerby Bypass (dual carriageway). Removal of some 90 per cent. of traffic through Temple Sowerby, including a substantial number of heavy goods vehicles, bringing safety and environmental benefits.	18	Spring 2004–05

M6 Motorway Extension Carlisle to Guards Mill. Upgrading to motorway status the only non-motorway link between Central Scotland and Southern England, which will include the replacement of the Mossband Viaduct.	65	2005–06
M62 Motorway Junction 6 Improvement. Improvements to the junction by providing links from the M62 motorway (westbound) to the M57 (northbound), and from the M57 (southbound) to the M62 (eastbound). The scheme will contribute to the regeneration of Merseyside and relieve congestion at the junction 6 Roundabout.	24	2007–08

The start dates given are subject to the satisfactory completion of the necessary statutory procedures.

There are two other TPI schemes that are currently under construction. These are:

Scheme	Estimated cost (£ million)	Completion date
A500 Basford Hough Shavington Bypass. Removal of some 80 per cent. of traffic through Basford Hough and Shavington, including a substantial number of heavy goods vehicles.	28.2	Spring 2003
A66 Stainburn and Great Clifton Bypass. Removal of some 75 to 80 per cent. of traffic through Stainburn and Great Clifton, including a substantial number of heavy goods vehicles.	7.2	December 2002

There is also one other scheme that is not in the TPI, but which is currently under construction. This is the provision of a new junction 8 on the M62 at Warrington, and the widening of the motorway between junctions 8 and 9. The cost of the scheme [illegible] around £20 million, which is being met by the developer of the nearby Omega Development site. The expected completion date is December 2002.

There are also a number of local authority road schemes, which have been provisionally accepted for funding by the Secretary of State. They are:

Scheme	Estimated cost (£ million)	Completion date
Alderley Edge Bypass	38	October 2003
Bridgefoot Environmental Enhancement	6	April 2003
Carlisle Northern Development	22	June 2004
The Glossop Spur	7	August 2004
Hall Lane Improvement—Liverpool	9	April 2005

The SEMMMS report recommended three new road proposals to be taken forward by the local authorities. These are: Poynton Bypass; A555 MALRW; and the A6(M) Stockport north-south Bypass.

Roads

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the total lengths of roads controlled by each local authority is, sub-divided between road classification. [66001]

Mr. Jamieson: The total length of public road controlled by local authorities in Great Britain was 377,346 kilometres as at 1 April 2001. A full analyses of the 11 classes of local authority roads within each of the 204 local authorities within Great Britain can be found by following the links at the following website: http://www.transtat.dft.gov.uk/roadtraf/gorlen01.htm

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to reduce the value he puts on reducing road congestion when calculating a rail scheme's value for money. [66060]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority's Freight Strategy, published in May 2001, announced that it was undertaking a review of the valuation of road congestion costs in time and money for lorry miles switched to rail. This review is on-going and I cannot prejudge the SRA's conclusions.

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action the Government are taking to reduce road congestion. [64351]

Mr. Jamieson: It is intended that the 10-year plan will reduce road congestion below current levels by 2010. Under the 10-year plan £181.9 billion of investment will improve strategic roads, railways and local transport.

Speed Limits

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research has been conducted (a) for and (b) by his Department into the impact of variable speed limits; what plans he has in relation to variable speed limits; and if he will make a statement. [64133]

Mr. Jamieson: The Transport Research Laboratory (TRL) monitored trials on the effectiveness of variable speed limits outside schools. Variable Message Signs were installed outside schools that reduced the speed limit typically one hour around school arrival and leaving times. The result showed very little reduction in vehicle speeds and the report concluded that as a speed reducing feature they were ineffective.

The Highways Agency is also currently trialling variable speed limits on sections of the M25. Independent monitoring and assessment of the scheme is being undertaken by TRL and the results so far have been encouraging. The area over which the variable speed limits operate has recently been extended. The extension is being closely monitored and results are expected next year.

"Walking in Towns and Cities"

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action has been taken to implement the Transport Committee's report, "Walking in Towns and Cities"; and if he will make a statement. [64223]

Mr. Jamieson: Since the Government's response to the Select Committee was published in November 2001, a number of actions have taken place. A draft national walking strategy is being prepared and will be issued for consultation in due course. A series of regional seminars is under way throughout England and we are reviewing proposals for the establishment of an interactive website. We are developing a specification for research on attitudes to walking. Finally, we are reviewing and updating our technical guidance on walking.

Railtrack

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when each of the asset registers are expected to be placed in the data room that is being prepared by the administrators of Railtrack; [65283]

(2) what the status of the data room being prepared by the administrators to Railtrack is; and if he will make a statement; [65280]

(3) what the location is of the data room being prepared by the administrators of Railtrack; [65282]

(4) if he will place in the Library the index of reports in, or due to be placed in, the data room by the administrators of Railtrack. [65281]

Mr. Jamieson: These are matters for the administrators.

Railway Byelaws

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, column 771W, on railway byelaws, for what reasons (a) Union Railways (North), (b) Union Railways (South) and (c) Hull Trains have written to the Department about their proposals for making byelaws based on the framework set; what advice, guidance and directions were given by his Department in response; and if he will list the questions raised related to the (i) interpretation and (ii) application of current byelaws by (A) GNER, (B) Arriva Trains Merseyside and (C) Thameslink. [66075]

Mr. Jamieson: Union Railways (North) Ltd. and Union Railways (South) Ltd. approached the Department in respect of the application of the framework set of byelaws to infrastructure for which they are responsible. The Department is in discussion with them on the most appropriate means. Hull Trains Ltd. sought advice on the procedure for making byelaws, which the Department has provided.

GNER inquired about the level of fine available for the offence of trespass under their byelaws. Arriva Trains Merseyside inquired about changing the name of the operator on their byelaws. Thameslink inquired about the scope of the definition of 'authorised persons' in their byelaws.

Strategic Rail Authority

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the Strategic Rail Authority's balance sheet will reflect the potential liabilities incurred as a result of its underwriting of loans to Network Rail. [65403]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer the hon. Member to the statement given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, on 27 June 2002, Official Report, columns 971–73, and to the subsequent reply given to a question from the hon. Member, Official Report, column 983.

Potters Bar Rail Crash

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for a public inquiry into the Potters Bar rail crash. [64606]

Mr. Jamieson: A formal independent investigation into the causes of the Potters Bar train derailment is being undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive (HSE). The terms of reference allow for a thorough and broad investigation into all the circumstances and the root causes. We will await the outcome of HSE's investigations before deciding whether they raise issues which would merit further investigation by a public inquiry. Any safety-critical information that comes to light will immediately be disseminated to the railway industry to prevent any further similar accidents in the future.

Rail Freight

Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he will implement to help achieve the Government's target for an increase in rail freight; and if he will make a statement. [65170]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority set out in its Freight Strategy last year the detailed plans for achieving the rail freight growth envisaged by the Government's 10-year Plan for Transport.

Reading Station

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the average age is of the rails at Reading station. [64597]

Mr. Jamieson: My Department does not hold such information. It is an operational matter for Railtrack.

Railways

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (a) guidance he has given and (b) legislation is in place with regard to delay attribution on the railways; what plans there are to change them; and if he will make a statement. [64150]

Mr. Jamieson: Delay attribution is undertaken in accordance with internal rail industry processes and is not specifically regulated. The Track Access Agreements between Train Operating Companies and Railtrack (which are overseen by the Rail Regulator) contain a schedule (Schedule 8) which gives high level guidance about delay attribution. An Industry Delay Attribution Board, with representatives from the whole of the rail industry handles the day to day detailed attribution of individual delays.

Women's Refuges

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions (1) how many women's refuges have received Government funding in each of the last five years; [59841]

(2) how many refuges for women have been built in Britain in each of the last five years. [59842]

Mr. McNulty: I have been asked to reply.

The Government's main capital and revenue funding for refuge and support provision is provided from the following sources:

The Housing Corporation's Approved Development Plan (ADP) provides capital allocations to RSLs for the provision of social housing, including women's refuges. Revenue funding for housing management and support is provided via the Corporation's Supported Housing Management Grant (SHMG).

Transitional Housing Benefit: provides rent and housing support costs, for those women who are eligible. (Note that from 1 April 2003, the elements of THB that provide support, and SHMG, will become part of Supporting People Grant.)

Over the past five years, women's refuges will also have been eligible for funding from Government regeneration programmes, such as the Single Regeneration Budget (SRB).

Local Government funding is provided by many local authorities, who provide a range of services, including housing and support, advice, advocacy and children's services.

Records are not held centrally of all women's refuges in England which have received funding or been built over the last five years as funding comes from a wide range of sources, and it is impossible to quantify the total amount and the total number of units completed. However, the table shows the number of schemes funded through the Housing Corporation's ADP and Safer Communities Supported Housing Fund over the last five years. The table also shows the number of completed units through the same funding streams.

Housing Corporation ADP and Safer Communities Supported Housing Fund

	Number of:
	Schemes approved	Units completed
1998–99	13	177
1999–2000	17	234
2000–01	30	45
2001–02	41	226
2002–03	30	n/a

Note:

Figures for Scotland and Wales are a matter for the devolved Administrations.

Performance Targets

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the performance targets that his Department, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies are required to meet, apart from those set out in the public service agreements for 1999 to 2002 and 2001 to 2004; and if he will specify for each target (a) who sets it and (b) who monitors achievement against it. [60462]

Mr. Leslie: I have been asked to reply.

In addition to its PSA targets, the former DTLR had a number of targets set in the supporting Service Delivery Agreement (SDA) agreed between the then DETR and Treasury Ministers following the 2000 Spending Review. (Those relating to the Fire Service were agreed with Home Office Ministers, whose responsibility the Fire Service then was.) Achievement against these targets is monitored by the Department's Finance Directorate and reported quarterly to Ministers and to the Treasury. The 19 SDA targets and progress against them were published in the DETR Annual Report for 2001 (Command 5105) and in the DTLR Annual Report for 2002 (Command 5405).

Each of the former DTLR's 10 executive agencies were set key targets for 2002–03 by Ministers. These were announced to Parliament through written answers, details of which are set out as follows. Each agency chief executive is accountable to Ministers for the performance of their agency. The Department also regularly monitors performance against each agency's targets. All DTLR agencies publish annual report and accounts at the end of every financial year, which report on their performance against their targets.

I refer my hon. Friend to the answers on DTLR agencies targets as given on:

29 January 2002, Official Report, column 203W—Highways Agency

26 March 2002, Official Report, column 678W—Planning Inspectorate

26 March 2002, Official Report, column 947W—Maritime and Coastguard Agency

29 April 2002, Official Report, column 554W—The Rent Service

9 May 2002, Official Report, column 298W—Fire Service College

15 May 2002, Official Report, column 674W—Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre

16 May 2002, Official Report, column 795W—Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, Driving Standards Agency, Vehicle Certification Agency, Vehicle Inspectorate.

Performance targets for executive NDPBs sponsored by the former DTLR, including outputs to be achieved, are normally agreed by Ministers and set out in the published business or corporate plan of the NDPB. Copies of such plans are available from the bodies. In most cases the Department monitors performance against these targets and for the more high profile bodies progress is discussed with Ministers. Outputs and achievements of each executive body are set out in its annual report. Copies of the annual report are available in the Library of the house.

The Secretary of State has no powers of direction over the General Lighthouse Authorities' operational activities and those bodies are responsible for setting their own performance targets and the level of service required. A business plan for the Standards Board for England (created in 2001) is being prepared and performance targets will be agreed with the Department. The Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) is required, by its Directions and Guidance from the Secretary of State, to work within its statutory framework to deliver the key rail targets set out in "Transport 2010: the Ten Year Plan" and to work with the rail industry to achieve substantial improvements in performance. Statistics in SRA's regular publications, "On track" and "National Rail Trends", provide an indication of achievement.

No performance targets are set for the former Department's advisory NDPBs. Each advisory body normally sets its own programme of work for each year within its remit to advise Ministers on the particular policy area and agree this with the Department. No formal monitoring of performance takes place for these advisory bodies but outputs are set out in each body's annual report.

British Transport Police

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has held with the Home Secretary about the future deployment of the British Transport Police; and if he will make a statement. [65741]

Mr. Jamieson: The deployment of the British Transport Police (BTP) is an operational matter for the Chief Constable. My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Transport and the Home Secretary have agreed to provide central funds of £1.36 million to the BTP to support their participation in the Street Crime Initiative in London. This funding will enable the BTP to procure additional officers and equipment so that they can maximise their contribution to the initiative by targeting street crime in and around London's tube and rail network.

TREASURY

Refrigerators

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when Her Majesty's Customs and Excise first stopped the export of second-hand fridges in response to the European Regulation; when it lifted that ban, and why; when it restored it; and what the total value was of second-hand fridges exported in (a) 1999, (b) 2000 and (c) 2001. [62609]

John Healey [holding answer 17 June 2002]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 13 March, Official Report, column 1107W. Customs statistics do not separately identify the value of second hand fridges exported.

Financial Ombudsman

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what power the financial ombudsman has to (a) impose and (b) collect fines from recalcitrant companies and individuals found guilty of selling incorrect policies. [65592]

Ruth Kelly: The Financial Ombudsman Service deals with complaints against financial services firms. It does not impose fines but where it decides a complaint against a firm, it can require the firm to make good the complainant's losses. The Financial Services Authority, as regulator, makes rules for regulated firms, including rules that they comply promptly with an ombudsman's decision. The FSA has a full range of disciplinary and enforcement powers over regulated firms, including the power to impose and collect fines.

State Pensions

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 12 June, Official Report, column 1290W, on state pensions, what proportion of the rise for each of the listed pension schemes since 1997 is caused by (a) increases in prices and salaries, (b) a growth in the number of public servants, (c) reassessments of mortality rates and (d) other reasons; and if he will make a statement. [64500]

Mr. Boateng: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my answer of 21 June, Official Report, column 586W.

Pensions Mis-selling

John Mann: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on recent action which he has taken on mis-selling of pensions. [63410]

Ruth Kelly: The Financial Services Authority announced earlier this year that it expected to bring the review of mis-sold pensions to a close by its target date of 30 June 2002. By the end of this year the vast majority of consumers with outstanding claims will have received the compensation due to them.

Spending Review

Mr. Howard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has determined the date for this year's spending review announcement. [65730]

John Healey: The Chancellor expects to announce the date shortly.

Regional Organisation

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which of the agencies and NDPBs sponsored by his Department have a regional organisation; and if he will list the counties and unitary authorities in each region in (a) 1997 and (b) 2002. [58941]

Mr. Boateng: None of the agencies and NDPBs sponsored by the Treasury has a regional organisation.

OECD PISA Survey

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) pupils and (b) schools who were asked to take part in the OECD PISA survey refused to participate. [65134]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning how many (a) pupils and (b) schools who were asked to take part in the OECD PISA survey refused to participate. (65134)

The numbers of pupils and schools in England that were asked to take part in the OECD PISA survey and refused to participate are shown in Table 2.1 of "Student Achievement in England—Results in reading, mathematical and scientific literacy among 15-year-olds from the OECD PISA 2000 study", published by ONS in May 2002.

The report is available for free at: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/statbase/Product.asp?vlnk=8169&More=N

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps were taken to assess the educational achievements of pupils who refused to sit the OECD PISA survey tests; and whether this information was incorporated into the PISA results. [65135]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning what steps were taken to assess the educational achievements of pupils who refused to sit the OECD PISA survey tests; and whether this information was incorporated into the PISA results.(65135)

The educational achievement of pupils who refused to sit the OECD PISA survey test were not assessed for the reasons given in Section A.4 under 'Representativeness of the sample of students', in Appendix A of "Student Achievement in England—Results in reading, mathematical and scientific literacy among 15-year-olds from the OECD PISA 2000 study". This report was published by ONS in May 2002.

As an alternative, test results at Key State 3 were sought directly from participating students so a comparison could be made with national statistics. However due to poor recollection by students, these data were incomplete and unreliable and therefore no comparison could be made.

The report is available free at: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/statbase/Product.asp?vlnk=8169&More=N

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reasons the schools which refused to participate in the OECD PISA survey gave for their refusal. [65133]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning what reasons the schools which refused to participate in the OECD PISA survey gave for their refusal. (65133)

For each school that chose not to participate in the OECD PISA survey in England, ONS attempted to ask the reasons why. Responses from schools varied in their level of detail and so it was not possible to conduct a systematic analysis. However, the most frequently cited reasons related to the time demands the survey would place upon school staff and on the selected students.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many pupils were asked to sit the OECD PISA survey test for (a) reading, (b) mathematical and (c) scientific literacy; and how they were chosen. [65137]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning how many pupils were asked to sit the OECD PISA survey test for (a) reading, (b) mathematical and (c) scientific literacy; and how they were chosen.(65137)

Thirty-five students were randomly sampled in each participating school by ONS using lists of all students born in 1984 provided by the schools. Student sampling procedures and student response for PISA are described in Section 2.3 of Chapter 2 of "Student Achievement in England—Results in reading, mathematical and scientific literacy among 15-year-olds from the OECD PISA 2000 study" (ONS, May 2002).

The survey in England assessed all 4,120 participating pupils in reading literacy, 2,292 pupils in mathematical literacy and 2,284 in scientific literacy. The subjects that pupils were assessed in were determined by which of nine PISA test booklets had been randomly assigned to them.

The report is available for free at: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/statbase/Product.asp?vlnk=8169&More=N

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what basis schools were selected for inclusion in the OECD PISA survey; and how replacement schools were selected. [65129]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning on what basis schools were selected for inclusion in the OECD PISA survey; and how replacement schools were selected. (65129)

Section 2.3 of Chapter 2 of "Student Achievement in England—Results in reading, mathematical and scientific literacy among 15-year-olds from the OECD PISA 2000 study", (ONS, May 2002) outlines how schools were randomly sampled for the OECD PISA survey in England and describes the steps taken to represent the different types of schools in the correct proportions. For each school that was selected to take part, two potential replacement schools had been identified. Appendix A of this report describes the sampling procedures for replacement schools, which were designed so that the replacement schools had similar educational characteristics to the original school.

The report is available for free at: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/statbase/Product.asp?vlnk=8169&More=N.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the OECD's policy is regarding the inclusion of replacement schools in the OECD PISA survey. [65130]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning the OECD's policy regarding the inclusion of replacement schools in the OECD PISA survey. (65130)

The OECD's specification for sampling schools for the OECD PISA survey required that a minimum response rate of 85 per cent. be achieved. Where this response rate fell between 65 per cent. and 85 per cent., it could still be achieved by using replacement sampling in line with procedures specified by the OECD. These are outlined in Section A.2 under "Replacement Sampling" in Appendix A of the ONS report, published in May 2002: "Student Achievement in England—Results in reading, mathematical and scientific literacy among 15-year-olds from the OECD PISA 2000 study".

The report is available for free at: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/statbase/Product.asp?vlnk=8169&More=N.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the schools selected as replacement schools for the OECD PISA survey. [65131]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning the list of schools selected as replacement schools for the OECD PISA survey. (65131)

The Data Protection Act requires the Office for National Statistics (ONS) to honour any pledge that it makes to respondents before taking part in its surveys. Both the sampled schools and sampled pupils were assured before agreeing to co-operate that their decision to take part and the information they gave would be held in confidence by ONS. Consequently ONS cannot release the names of participating or non-responding schools or pupils.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of schools selected for the OECD PISA survey agreed to take part (a) prior to the inclusion of replacement schools and (b) after the inclusion of replacement schools; and what the minimum proportion of the originally selected schools is deemed acceptable by the OECD for inclusion in the international survey. [65128]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your question concerning what proportion of schools selected for the OECD PISA survey agreed to take part (a) prior to the inclusion of replacement schools and (b) after the inclusion of replacement schools; and what the minimum proportion of the originally selected schools is deemed acceptable by the OECD for inclusion in the international survey. (65128)

The numbers of schools in England that were selected for PISA and agreed to take part (a) prior to the inclusion of replacement schools and (b) after the inclusion of replacement schools are shown in Table 2.1 of "Student Achievement in England—Results in reading, mathematical and scientific literacy among 15-year-olds from the OECD PISA 2000 study", published by ONS in May 2002.

The corresponding response rates calculated by the OECD are (a) 59% and (b) 82% These fall below the response rates required by OECD for all participating countries of 65% and 85% respectively. The OECD therefore reviewed which schools had taken part and found that their profile of GCSE exam results was not statistically significantly different from that of all schools in England. An international review panel of experts that was established for this purpose by the OECD therefore concluded that low response from schools had not distorted English or UK results. Further details of this review can be found in Section A.4 under 'Representativeness of the sample of schools', in Appendix A of "Student Achievement in England—Results in reading, mathematical and scientific literacy among 15-year-olds from the OECD PISA 2000 study", published by ONS in May 2002.

Pension Funds

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the average rate of tax relief was on contributions to pension funds for each of the years 1996–97 to 2000–01 corresponding to the rate of 30 per cent. estimated for 2001–02 in Table t7.9 on the Inland Revenue Website. [64125]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested is contained in the table.

	Estimated average rate of tax relief on contributions
1996–97	28
1997–98	28
1998–99	29
1999–2000	29
2000–01	29

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has today announced a review of Government statistics on contributions to private pensions involving ONS, DWP, Inland Revenue and external advisers.

PFI Contracts

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate his Department has made of the payments under PFI contracts for each year from 2002–03 to 2027–28 for PFI deals which are expected to reach preferred bidder stage in the next three years. [65149]

Ruth Kelly: The Treasury has no deals approaching preferred bidder stage at present.

Demographic Change

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the Government projection is for demographic change in (a) London and (b) for all other regions in England over the next (i) five and (ii) 10 years for the age groups (A) 45 to 50, (B) 50 to 55, (C) 55 to 60, (D) 60 to 65, (E) 65 to 70, (F) 70 to 75, (G) 75 to 80, (H) 80 to 85 and (I) 85 years and over. [65143]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Paul Burstow, dated 1 July 2002:

The National Statistician has been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question on what the Government projection is for demographic change in (a) London and (b) for all other regions in England over the next (i) five and (ii) 10 years for the age-groups (A) 45–50, (B) 50–55, (C) 55 to 60, (D) 60–65, (E) 65–70, (F) 70–75, (G) 75–80, (I) 85 years and over. I am replying in his absence. (65413).

Northern Ireland (Euro)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the extent of the use of the euro in Northern Ireland, especially in border areas. [65589]

Ruth Kelly: The Government have not made any assessment of euro-based transactions in the UK.

It is entirely a commercial decision for UK business to determine whether or not they wish to accept the euro or any other foreign currency.

EU (Sustainable Convergence)

Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will include the economies of the applicant countries to the EU in the assessment of whether there can be sustainable convergence between the UK and the economies of the single currency. [66092]

Ruth Kelly: The Government have said that they will complete an assessment of the five economic tests within two years of the start of this Parliament.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to reply to the letter to him dated 23 May from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. J. Greenhalgh. [66205]

Ruth Kelly: A reply will be sent to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton shortly. As the right hon. Member's constituent's letter points out, there have been a number of international meetings where aid and aid spending have been discussed. We have been awaiting the outcome of these meetings, most notably the G8 summit in Kananaskis, to include the latest information in the reply.

EU Committees

Angus Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the EU Committee on statistics relating to the trading of goods between member states is next due to meet; whether representatives of the Scottish Executive (a) have been and (b) are members of it; and if he will make a statement. [64910]

John Healey: The Committee on Statistics relating to the trading of goods between member states met on 27 and 28 June, and is next due to meet on 14–15 November 2002. The UK is normally represented by two officials from HM Customs and Excise. The Customs delegates at this committee represent all of the UK.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

School Playing Fields

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to her oral statement of 24 June 2002, Official Report, column 599, on the sale of school playing fields, if she will place in the Library the figures available to her Department in respect of sales between 1979 and 1997. [64703]

Mr. Caborn: Statistics on playing field sales were not collected until our playing fields legislation came into force. Public concern about the loss of school playing fields led directly to the introduction in October 1998 of Section 77 of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998. Before Section 77 was introduced, only grant-maintained schools were required to seek consent from the Secretary of State before selling land, including areas of their playing fields. Local authorities and other schools that owned their own playing fields were free to sell without restriction.

The then Department for Education and Employment estimated that an average of 40 playing fields a month were sold in this way before October 1998. Their estimate is based on the number of playing field disposals at grant-maintained schools between April 1996, when the previous Government further encouraged the disposal of playing fields by relaxing the Local Authority Capital Finance Regulations which governed the use of sale proceeds, and 1 October 1998, when section 77 took effect. During this 30-month period, some 64 grant-maintained schools were given approval to dispose of areas of playing field, which is an average of over two a month. Using the proportion of grant-maintained schools at that time compared with the number of other schools, the Department for Education and Skills estimate the total number of playing field disposals each month to have been around 40.

Sport England

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport in (a) 2000–01 and (b) 2001–02 what percentages of Sport England's Exchequer grant-in-aid was spent on (i) staff costs, excluding national centres, (ii) administrative expenses, (iii) publicity, promotions and communications, (iv) grants to national governing bodies, (v) grants to Sportscoach UK, (vi) grants to the Youth Sports Trust, (vii) sports science and sports medicine, (viii) national centres, (ix) grants to other national sports bodies, excluding NGBs and (x) regional support. [64846]

Mr. Caborn: The information requested is as follows:

Percentage

	2000–01	2001–02
Staff costs excluding national centres	20.56	15.56
Administrative expenses	10.60	9.08
Publicity, promotions and communications	3.29	2.37

Grants to other national sports bodies	8.54	7.36
Regional support	28.60	35.56
Total	100.00	100.00

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will list the projections for 2002–03 for the percentages of Sport England's grant-in-aid which will be spent on (a) staff costs, excluding national centres, (b) administrative expenses, (c) publicity, promotions and communications, (d) grants to national governing bodies, (e) grants to Sportscoach UK, (f) grants to the Youth Sports Trust, (g) sports science and sports medicine, (h) national centres, (i) grants to other national sports bodies, excluding NGBs and (j) regional support. [64847]

Mr. Caborn: The information requested is as follows:

Percentage

	2002–03
Staff costs excluding national centres	12.76
Administrative expenses	6.41
Publicity, promotions and communications	1.66
Grants to national governing bodies	12.85
Grants to Sportscoach UK	2.69

Sport (West Cumbria)

Dr. Jack Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what progress has been made by the Sports Action Zone in West Cumbria; what investment has taken place in each of the local authorities covered by the Action Zone; and if she will make a statement. [64856]

Mr. Caborn: Eight months into the delivery of year one of the West Cumbria and Barrow Sport Action Zone Action Plan, programmes and projects with total funding of £1,210,031 have been approved in the zone. These vary from strategic programmes to local projects, lasting between one day and five years. The contribution so far from the Lottery funded Sport Action Zone Magnet Fund is £435,833. Partnership development with a wide range of cross boundary agendas and strategic partners has been a feature of the implementation of the Action Plan and a number of projects have emerged from the strategic programmes in the zone, resulting in additional investment and localized activities.

In summary the position in each local authority area for primary funded Sport Action Zones programmes and projects is as follows:

Allerdale:

Total programme costs £169,493; magnet funding £89,000.

Projects include:

1. Allerdale Baton Relay race—linking local activities and events with the Commonwealth games.
2. Stop smoking walking for health days—developed in partnership with the Health Action Zone and the Primary Care Trust.
3. Promotion of the value of physical activity in schools and GP practices.
4. Allerdale Community Chest small grants scheme—developed in partnership with the borough council and county council.
5. Salterbeck Sport Development Officer and Co-ordinator—covering various Workington wards, developed in partnership with Impact Housing Association.
6. Home Housing SOS programme—activities for young people on housing estates developed in partnership with Home Housing Association and the Millennium Volunteers Programme—aiming to foster a closer relationship between residents and social landlords.

Barrow:

Total programme costs £390,418; magnet funding £125,313.

Projects include:

1. Ba[illegible]ommunity Chest small grants scheme—developed in partnersh[illegible]ith the Barrow borough sports council.
2. Active Living Fo[illegible]All Consortium Programme—employing three specific sport development officers, linking Age Concern, Barrow Sport Development Team, the Community Safety Officer, Morecambe Bay Primary Care Trust and Health Promotion. Many smaller localized projects have been developed from this strategic programme.

3. Barrow Equity Officer—development of opportunities and removal of barriers to participation, specifically with disability and sport.
4. Summer Scheme 2001 and Summer Scheme 2002—activities for young people throughout the summer holidays.
5. Sports Directory and website—development of a web-based directory of sporting provision in the borough of Barrow.

Copeland:

Total programme costs £460,984; magnet funding £105,500.

Projects include:

6. Copeland Community Chest small grants scheme—developed in partnership with the borough council.
7. Egremont Rural Youth Works—development of a range of programmes and projects tackling anti-social behaviour in Egremont, aiming to reduce crime by 50 per cent. over five years.
8. Healthier Communities Worker—in partnership with South Whitehaven Single Regeneration Budget—development of local activity projects linked with capacity building in South Whitehaven.
9. General Practitioner Referral Scheme—exercise on prescription in partnership with the borough council and Health Action Zone.
10. Summer scheme 2002 providing activities for young people throughout the summer holidays in partnership with a range of other agencies and organisations.

Allerdale and Copeland:

Total costs for cross-district programmes £89,700 magnet funding £48,500.

Projects include:

1. links and jointly funded programmes and projects with the Health Action Zone and health authority.
2. Sports Directory—development of a directory and web-based source of information on sporting and physical activity opportunities in West Cumbria.
3. Walking your Way to Health schemes.
4. Co-ordination of Cardiac rehabilitation stage IV throughout West Cumbria.

Allerdale, Barrow and Copeland:

Total costs for cross-district programmes £74,640 magnet funding £67,320.

Projects include:

1. Research on the impact that sporting activities bring to the wider economic and social agendas.
2. Administration assistant for the zone manager.

Allerdale, Barrow, Copeland, Carlisle, Eden and Kendal:

Total costs for cross-district programmes £24,796 magnet funding £7,500.

Projects include:

Adults Other Than Teachers—in partnership with the local education authority and Cumbria Sport. Training of adults to participate in the delivery and development of extra-curricular activities linked to Cumbrian schools.

National Lottery

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will provide a list for each distributor of lottery money of how much money from held funds has been committed, and to whom and when the commitment was made. [65777]

Mr. Caborn: Money raised by the National Lottery for good causes is paid into the National Lottery Distribution Fund (NLDF). Any interest earned is added to the amount available for distribution. Money is subsequently drawn down from the fund by lottery distributors when it is needed to pay grant recipients and not before.

Commitments by the 15 lottery distributors at 31 March 2002 totalled £4,127,025,203. This is broken down as follows.

Heritage Lottery Fund	1,058,936,426
Sport England	847,653,000
New Opportunities Fund	881,804,894
Community Fund	549,556,460
Arts Council of England	245,735,456
Millennium Commission	229,000,000
Film Council	59,866,380
Sport Scotland	53,300,138
UK Sports Council	50,913,971
Sports Council of Wales	39,435,417
Arts Council of Wales	37,839,215
Scottish Arts Council	35,566,366
Arts Council of Northern Ireland	18,112,610
Sports Council of Northern Ireland	14,360,700
Scottish Screen	4,944,170

These funds will have been committed by distributors to a great number of projects, which could not be listed individually except at disproportionate cost.

Select Committee Report

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she will publish the Government's response to the Culture, Media and Sport Committee's Fourth report on Communications. [66471]

Tessa Jowell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I are today jointly publishing the Government's response to the Select Committee's Fourth report on Communications. The response is available on both the DTI (www.dti.gov.uk) and DCMS (www.culture.gov.uk) websites. Copies of the response were laid before Parliament earlier today and placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Liabilities Management Authority

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when she expects to publish the White Paper on the Liabilities Management Authority. [65114]

Mr. Wilson: The White Paper on managing the nuclear legacy will be published shortly.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions she has had with British Energy and BNFL on the proposed Liabilities Management Authority. [65003]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Since the announcement made by my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 28 November 2001, Official Report, column 990, my officials have had discussions with both companies on a range of issues, including the setting up of the Liabilities Management Authority (LMA).

A White Paper on managing the nuclear legacy will be published shortly. This will set out the Government's proposals for the LMA as a body responsible to Government for ensuring that public sector civil nuclear liabilities are dealt with safely, securely, cost-effectively and in ways which protect the environment for the benefit of current and future generations.

Dr. Jack Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made on the development of policy on nuclear liabilities management; when she expects to publish the White Paper; and if she will make a statement. [64857]

Mr. Wilson: The White Paper on managing the nuclear legacy will be published shortly.

Energy Policy

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what targets have been set for the development of combined heat and power plants. [64345]

Mr. Meacher: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have set a target of at least 10,000 MWe of installed combined heat and power by 2010. [illegible] draft "CHP Strategy to 2010" was launched for consultation by me on 15 May. The closing date for responses is 7 August 2002. The draft strategy sets out measures to support the achievement of the Government's CHP target. Copies of the draft strategy have been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Arms Exports

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what net cash flow from the Export Credits Guarantee Department was attributed to defence exports in each of the last five years, broken down by (a) interest rate support, (b) claims paid, (c) interest paid and (d) operating expenses. [62032]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 21 June 2002, Official Report, column 589W.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support Trade Partners UK provided to assist British companies to attend or exhibit at the IPAS 2002 (International Police & Security Equipment Exhibition) in Iran; and which (a) companies and (b) amounts were involved. [62015]

Nigel Griffiths: Trade Partners UK provided no support to British companies to attend IPAS 2002 in Iran.

Redundancy Payments

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much was paid out from public funds in redundancy payments in lieu of companies in liquidation in the last financial year. [62791]

Alan Johnson: For the financial year ending 31 March 2002 the redundancy payments service paid some £208.7 million to redundant workers out of the National Insurance Fund. Most of their former employers were insolvent but in some cases the service made payments where solvent employers were unable or willing to pay. The figure includes statutory redundancy pay, unpaid wages, unpaid holiday pay and payments to compensate workers for not receiving proper notice. It does not include some £15.2 million in tax and national insurance contributions paid on behalf of workers and £2.1 million paid in pension contributions.

Heat Transfer Technology

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action she is taking to encourage the development of interseasonal heat transfer technology in the UK. [62551]

Mr. Wilson: Ground source heat pumps (GSHP) are a proven and reliable technology that can be commercially attractive in certain situations. DTI helped fund the establishment of a UK heat pump network in 1999 to promote the technology. The Government now encourages the development of this technology through the Carbon Trust's "Action Energy" programme, which is supported by DEFRA, the Scottish Energy Efficiency Office, the National Assembly for Wales and Invest Northern Ireland. The Carbon Trust currently supports the following GSHP activities:

(i) a new study to monitor the performance of domestic GSHP systems on three sites;

(ii) a proposed new study of a GSHP system in a single commercial building;

(iii) two small part-funded R&D projects;

(iv) the UK Heat Pump Network.

Export Finance (Energy Production)

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the coal power plants which have had British business involvement with ECGD assistance since 1992; and if she will make a statement in each case on (a) project name, (b) country location, (c) capacity in MW, (d) estimated carbon emissions and (e) the value of the loan guaranteed. [63200]

Ms Hewitt: The table lists the name, country location, capacity in MW, estimated carbon emissions per year, and the value of the loan guaranteed by ECGD for each of the coal-fired stations for which ECGD has guaranteed the repayment of a loan since 1992. The list does not include projects for which ECGD has solely provided overseas investment insurance and other insurances since such cases are treated as commercial in confidence.

In estimating the value of carbon emissions it has been assumed that, upon completion, the stations will operate for 60 per cent. of the time (5,256 hours per year). It has also been assumed that carbon makes up 27.3 per cent. of the atomic mass of CO_2 and that coal produces CO_2 at 0.687 tonnes per MW per hour.

These assumptions are taken from the greenhouse gas protocol website www.ghgprotocol.org and are the 1999 average values for power plants in "Economies In Transition" (i.e. markets where ECGD most commonly provides guarantees).

It should be noted that for most large power stations ECGD is only one of several financial providers.

Telephone Exchanges (Essex)

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which telephone exchanges in Essex have been converted to DSL; and what plans there are to convert the remaining exchanges. [63772]

Ms Hewitt: BT's website provides details of enabled exchanges by county: "http://www.bt.com/broadband/"

According to the information they provide, 35 exchanges in Essex have to date been enabled to provide ADSL services.

BT announced on 18 June that they will enable an exchange where a specified number of users have registered their interest, and will publicise how many more registrations are needed to reach the target. At first this offer will cover 300 exchanges, to be followed by a further 600.

Job Sharing

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to encourage businesses to employ job-share employees. [63668]

Alan Johnson: We are working with a wide range of businesses to raise awareness of the business benefits of flexible working, including job sharing. In addition, through our successful £10.5 million Work-Life Balance Challenge Fund programme, we are providing support and guidance to employers who want to adopt flexible working.

Evidence to date indicates an increase in people taking up opportunities to job share in projects supported by the Challenge Fund. We are also actively disseminating the emerging best practice, so that more businesses and employees will be able to benefit from flexible working arrangements.

In addition, from April 2003, parents of children aged under six and disabled children aged under eighteen will have a right to request to work flexibly (which includes job share) and employers will have a duty to consider requests seriously. This important new right will be accompanied by a package of support for both employers and employees.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the Department's staff are job-share employees. [63669]

Ms Hewitt: There are currently 10 staff sharing five jobs in DTI HQ and its agencies. The assumption is that all posts will be open to part-time and job share staff. If, exceptionally, there are objective reasons why a job may not be undertaken on a part-time or job share basis, the reasons would be stated clearly in the advertisement.

Nuclear Installations

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), of 10 June 2002, Official Report, column 968, if she will place in the Library a copy of the presentation from the Chief Inspector of Nuclear Installations. [63909]

Mr. Wilson: HSE is placing copies of the Chief Inspector's presentation in the Libraries of the House. It is also available on the HSE website.

Office for Civil Nuclear Security

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State [illegible] Trade and Industry with whom the office for Civil Nuclear Security discussed the potential vulnerability to attack of the Sellafield MOX plant, following the terrorist attacks in the United States on 11 September 2001; and if she will place in the Library a declassified version of the report prepared by the OCNS on SMP security. [63839]

Mr. Wilson: The Office for Civil Nuclear Security consulted with HSE's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and other Government departments and agencies as appropriate, as well as the Sellafield site licensees in considering the consequences of the attacks in the United States last September and in reviewing security measures in place at Sellafield. OCNS reports concentrate on security measures and as it is not Government policy to disclose details of security measures taken at civil nuclear sites, I will not be placing any declassified versions in the Libraries of the House.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether there is a prohibition against employing staff members of non Governmental organisations or independent research institutes as specialists for the office for Civil Nuclear Security. [63840]

Mr. Wilson: There is no such restriction. All applicants for posts to be filled are assessed on their suitability to meet the requirements of the post and vetting requirements. OCNS, as elsewhere in Government, is an equal opportunities employer.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she plans to increase the operating budget of the Office for Civil Nuclear Security. [63837]

Mr. Wilson: It has been agreed by the Treasury that the budget for the office for Civil Nuclear Security will be increased by £200,000 for the financial year 2002–03 and by £300,000 for the financial year 2003–04 in order to cover additional security and vetting posts.

Public Holidays

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate she has made of the cost to business of each public holiday in (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Scotland and (d) Northern Ireland. [64534]

Alan Johnson: Based on the most recent data available on Compensation of Employees from the Regional Accounts (produced by the Office for National Statistics), the estimated cost of a bank holiday to UK business in 1999 was £1.89 billion. The breakdown by country is (a) £1,610 million in England (b) £80 million in Wales (c) £160 million in Scotland and (d) £40 million in Northern Ireland. These figures are probably an overestimate since they assume that all businesses are closed on bank holidays; and that all employees, who do not work on bank holidays, are still paid.

Retail Sector (Start-up Assistance)

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what Government sponsored financial assistance is available to those wishing to start an enterprise within the retail sector. [64930]

Nigel Griffiths: The SBS operates a number of programmes aimed at helping small businesses in all sectors (including start-ups) to obtain finance. These include: Regional Venture Capital Funds; the Phoenix Fund; and the soon to be launched Early Growth Funding programme.

In addition, the SBS has been providing advisory support to start-up businesses identified with the potential for high growth. Since October 1999, some 8,500 pre and early start businesses have received support from Business Link Operators to assist them in reaching their high growth potential.

The SBS is currently consulting across Government and with the business support organisations in the private and public sectors, on a comprehensive strategy for helping people to start a business. The SBS Consultation document of 6 May sets out the issues involved and invites proposals for how to address them. A key theme is the need for resources to be targeted to ensure high quality help is available to all who seek it. Following the consultation exercise in July, an action plan will be published in the Autumn to detail the steps that the Government and key stakeholders will take to help more people to start and grow a business.

Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether a decision has been made on whether to extend the Small Firms Loan Guarantee scheme to excluded sectors. [64931]

Nigel Griffiths: I have received representations from a variety of bodies over a period of time about the extension of the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme to excluded business activities. The Scheme is currently being considered as part of the DTI's wider review of business support.

Temporary Agency Workers

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make an announcement on the Commission proposal for a directive on temporary agency workers. [58081]

Alan Johnson: The Government will begin a 16-week public consultation on the Commission proposal for a directive on temporary agency workers from today. It will give interested parties an opportunity to comment on the Commission proposals and their likely impact on the UK.

Nuclear Waste Storage (Dounreay)

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions she has had with the UKAEA on the progress of construction of facilities at Dounreay for the long-term storage of nuclear waste. [65113]

Mr. Wilson: None.

Committee Mandates

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the mandate of the European Energy and Transport Forum is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [61711]

Ms Hewitt: The European Energy and Transport Forum is a consultative committee which was established by the European Commission on 11 July 2001. Its purpose is to consider Commission initiatives in the field of energy and transport and gives its views. Its mandate is Commission Decision 2001/546/EC. The Forum comprises 34 members, including five from the UK. These were selected by a Commission process set out in Commission Decision 2001/C 205–06. The Forum has not yet met. When it does it will establish a programme of work that will, no doubt, include issues from the Commission White Paper on Transport and the Commission Green Paper on Energy Security. No costs to UK public funds arise from the Forum. More details are available on the EU website "http://europa.eu.int/comm/energy"-transport/en/forum en.html

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the mandate of the Consumer Committee is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [61699]

Ms Hewitt: The Consumer Committee was established by the European Commission in its "Decision (2000/323/EC)" of 4 May 2000. The Committee's mandate is to:

constitute a forum for general discussions on problems relating to consumer interests.

give opinions on Community matters affecting the protection of consumer interests.

advise and guide the Commission when it outlines policies and activities having an effect on consumers.

inform the Commission of developments in consumer policy in the member states.

act as a source of information and soundboard on Community action for the other national organizations.

The Committee meets on average four times a year in Brussels.

The Committee is composed of 20 member members and 20 alternates appointed by the Commission for a 3-year (renewable) mandate (1 per member state plus five representatives from the European consumer associations: AEC, ANEC, BEUC, COFACE, EURO COOP).

The secretariat and the presidency of the Committee are held by the European Commission. There is no cost to the UK public funds.

The items for consideration in the Committee are based on the requests for opinion made prior to each meeting by the Commission.

The minutes of meetings and Committee Opinions are published on the European Commission website.

Small and Medium-sized Enterprises

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on what assistance is available to firms that expand beyond the definition of SME. [65005]

Alan Johnson [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The Department has a range of support available for larger companies. This includes support for regional investment, innovation, collaborative research and development and knowledge transfer, exports and international trade and competitiveness activities in particular sectors such as the aerospace or automobile sectors. They also benefit from the Department's major investment in maintaining the excellence of the UK's science and engineering base.

Details of the Department's activities in these areas are set out in DTI's expenditure plans report (Cm 5416) which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry submitted to Parliament on 14 June.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what targets have been sought from or set for each local authority for increasing use of renewable energy; and what funding is contingent upon the achievement of these targets. [64284]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 25 June 2002]: The Government are committed to promoting a positive and strategic approach to regional planning for renewable energy development in the UK. Last year, we initiated the preparation of regional studies, including regional assessments of the potential for renewables and targets, representing the practical capacity achievable in regions by 2010. These studies have now been completed and the findings were published by Oxera in February 2002. These findings have also been channelled to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's office, who are currently revising the Planning Policy Guidance Note, PPG22, to give local planning authorities more up-to-date guidance on renewables planning.

I have also announced the allocation of £1.7 million worth of work in England, Wales and Northern Ireland, to take forward the facilitation of renewable energy planning. In addition, the Scottish Executive will continue to work with local authorities in Scotland on renewables planning. This is the first tranche of funding from the £2.5 million for planning announced by the PIU energy review. In addition to the DTI funding, the bids we received showed that matched funding of over £2 million can be expected from local organisations.

That is a real boost to this work and a very encouraging indication of the interest being taken at local level in renewables planning. This fund will be used to support the development of sub-regional targets and to take forward initiatives such as good practice guidelines and further stakeholder engagement in renewable energy developments.

The Renewables Obligation, which came into force on 1 April 2002, is the main instrument through which renewable energy development will be supported. The Obligation will be backed up by direct Government funding worth over £260 million for the period 2001–04, including the allocation of £74 million for the development of offshore wind projects, £78.5 million for the establishment of energy crops and biomass schemes and £20 million to kick-start a major solar PV demonstration scheme.

Insolvency Service

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what targets she has set the Insolvency Service executive agency for 2002–03. [66090]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Insolvency Service's planning assumption is that compulsory insolvencies will total 28,000 in the year to 31 March 2003, and I have therefore set it the target of completing 28,500 case administrations in the year to 31 March 2003 and to maintain the levels of Income Payment Orders achieved.

I have set the Service two new targets for 2002–03. The first is to publish quarterly results of the Service's User Satisfaction Index and introduce a benchmark score by 31 March 2003; and the second is to achieve IiP re-accreditation in the autumn of 2002.

I have also set it the targets of containing increases in the unit cost of administering bankruptcy and compulsory liquidation cases by 1 per cent. in real terms over the period 2002–04; and containing increases in the cost of investigations of bankruptcy and compulsory liquidation cases by 10 per cent. in real terms over the period 2002–04. These increases reflect plans by the Service to invest in information technology and staff resources to prepare for implementation of the Enterprise Bill and are expected to generate net reductions in unit costs over a five-year period.

I expect the Service to continue to achieve the levels of proceedings for disqualification taken against unfit directors as in previous years and reports on cases of criminal misconduct as in 2001–02. At the same time I look to the Service reducing the average time of the conclusion of disqualification proceedings arising from non-compulsory insolvencies from 27.5 months to 26 months by 31 March 2003; and to increasing the percentage of disqualification cases concluded within 30 months from 72 per cent. to 78 per cent. and those within 24 months from 33 per cent. to 40 per cent.

I also expect the Service to check and action at least 98 per cent. of Insolvency Services Account payment requisitions within four days or the due date, and to action 100 per cent. of invoices for payment within 30 days of receipt and 95 per cent. of invoices for payment within 20 days.

SCOTLAND

Employment Statistics

Mr. Joyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were in employment (a) at the most recent date for which figures are available and (b) in May 1997 for each constituency in Scotland. [61293]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Eric Joyce, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about employment in Scotland. (61304)

ONS publishes employment rates but not levels from the Labour Force Survey (LFS) for parliamentary constituencies.

The attached table gives estimates of working age employment rates for each constituency in Scotland for the periods March 1997 to February 1998, and March 2000 to February 2001. These estimates are from the LFS and are not seasonally adjusted.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Terrorists

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his plans to inform persons suspected of involvement in terrorist activities that their cases will not be pursued. [63943]

Dr. John Reid: We are still considering how best to implement the proposals which we and the Irish Government made in relation to this following the Weston Park talks. In the meantime, any inquiries received in relation to individuals wishing to establish whether they are wanted in Northern Ireland in relation to suspected terrorist activities have been communicated to the Attorney-General, who has referred them to the prosecuting authorities and the police.

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many people suspected of involvement in terrorist activities have been informed by the Northern Ireland Office since 10 April 1998 that they are no longer wanted by the prosecuting authorities; [63945]

(2) how many people residing outside the United Kingdom and suspected of involvement in terrorist activities have been informed by the Northern Ireland Office since 10 April 1998 that if they return to any part of the United Kingdom their cases will not be pursued by the prosecuting authorities. [63942]

Dr. John Reid: As a result of inquiries received and referred to the prosecuting authorities and the police, 32 individuals have been informed over the past two years that they are not wanted for arrest in relation to terrorist offences. In accordance with the policy announced by my predecessor on 29 September 2000, an additional 25 persons, who had left Northern Ireland without completing their sentences, have been informed since then that they can return to Northern Ireland without serving more time in custody and that the prosecuting authorities and police have confirmed they will not face fresh charges.

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many people suspected of involvement in terrorist activities will benefit from the provisions contained in paragraph 20 of the joint proposals published by the British and Irish Governments on 1 August 2001; [63944]

(2) how many people stand to benefit from the measures envisaged in paragraph 20 of the joint communique issued by her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Irish Republic on 1 August 2001 following their meeting at Weston Park. [56292]

Jane Kennedy: The British and Irish Governments recognised at the talks at Weston Park last summer that the issue of terrorists on the run needed to be dealt with. Paragraph 20 of the joint communique made following those talks committed both Governments to taking steps to resolve this issue. The Government stands by that commitment and is considering the options for discharging it. Until the Government have concluded how best to resolve the matter, it is not possible to give a reliable estimate of how many people it would effect.

Evelyn Glenholmes

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the decision was taken not to proceed with outstanding prosecutions against Evelyn Glenholmes; at which point she was informed of this decision; and if he will place the relevant correspondence in the Library. [63941]

Dr. John Reid: Ms Glenholmes' case was reviewed in 1995 by the Director of Public Prosecutions for England and Wales. He concluded that the evidence against her was insufficient and that the outstanding prosecution and extradition request to the Republic of Ireland should be dropped. Inquiries were made on her behalf in 2000 in the light of her wish to return to Northern Ireland. She was informed that there were no outstanding prosecutions against her.

Annual Leave

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the average annual leave entitlement is for staff in his Department in 2002. [64649]

Jane Kennedy: The average annual leave allowance entitlement of Northern Ireland civil servants and home civil servants in 2002 was 26 days.

Annual leave allowances are as follows:

Probationers

22 days allowance (increasing to 25 days after one year in service or on appointment if there has been a previous period of casual service providing there has been no break in service exceeding 12 months).

Full time staff

25 days during qualifying period

Grade A

30 days after 10 years service

Grade B1

30 days after 10 years service

Grade B2

30 days after 15 years service

Grade D2-C

30 days after 20 years service

Senior civil servants

30 days on entry to the service.

Members of Parliament (Personal Data)

Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information is held by his Department on each hon. Member in relation to (a) personal relationships, both current and past, (b) financial status and dealings, (c) connections with companies and interest groups, (d) connections with Governments and (e) published works; and what was held in January 2002. [61828]

Jane Kennedy: Ministers and officials in this Department have access to published reference sources, as well as to the information about hon. Members made publicly available by the House authorities, for the purpose of parliamentary business.

Police and Prison Officer Fatalities

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those members of the (a) RUC and (b) Northern Ireland Prison Service who resided in the Ards borough council area and have been killed in the line of duty since 1972. [62395]

Jane Kennedy: The PSNI does not maintain records of the address at the date of the death or by council area. If a next of kin changes address after the death the previous address is deleted from the system. The information provided in the table is therefore based on that currently available and should not be taken as being definitive.

Records are not maintained of the addresses of members of the Northern Ireland Prison Service who were killed in the line of duty. However, since 1972, 29 members of the Northern Ireland Prison Service have been killed.

Members of the RUC killed in the Ards borough council area since 1972

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Sudan

Mr. Alan Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if her Department is responsible for co-ordinating the Government's policy on the peace process in Sudan. [64805]

Clare Short: The day-to-day co-ordination of UK Government policy on the Sudan peace process is led by Alan Goulty, UK Special Representative for Sudan. Alan Goulty reports jointly to both the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for International Development. He is supported by a joint DFID/FCO team, the Sudan Unit.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations he has made to the Government of Sudan regarding the legalisation of female genital mutilation. [64601]

Clare Short: Our embassy in Khartoum has made representations at ministerial level in Khartoum, both bilaterally and in co-ordination with EU Partners, on the Sudanese Government's reported plans to legalise female genital mutilation (FGM). The Government of Sudan reassured us that there were no plans to legalise the practice. The embassy also works closely with Sudanese civil society groups in advocating the eradication of FGM. It forms part of the campaign for ratification of the UN Convention on the Eradication of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) in which we have actively supported the growing women's rights movement and UN attempts to address these issues. In particular, our embassy has ongoing contact with UNICEF. We have also funded various projects aimed at eradication of FGM, including the national advocacy campaign for 2002–03.

Uganda

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the level and impact of her Department's financial support for the Education Management Information System in Uganda. [64980]

Clare Short: DFID's financial and technical support for the Education Management Information System (EMIS) in Uganda has achieved a high level of impact and has contributed greatly to improved decision making in education and the establishment of a rational well-managed education system.

European Heads of Government Meeting

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the outcome of the European Heads of Government Meeting in Seville on 21 and 22 June regarding trade and development. [62925]

Clare Short: The meeting of European Heads of Government at Seville considered trade and development in the context of the EU's preparations for the World Summit on Sustainable Development which will be held in Johannesburg later this year.

It was agreed that the EU should continue to seek a comprehensive and timely conclusion to the Doha Development Agenda, in order to increase the benefits of trade liberalisation as an engine for the sustainable development of developing countries, and support efforts to create regional free-trade areas between them. The EU will invite other developed countries to join its positive agenda on globalisation, trade and finance to help developing countries benefit from access to developed—country markets so that globalisation can work to the advantage of all.

Tony Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the outcome of the European Council Meeting in Seville on 21 and 22 June regarding trade and development. [64670]

Clare Short: The meeting of European Heads of Government at Seville considered trade and development in the context of the EU's preparations for the World Summit on Sustainable Development which will be held in Johannesburg later this year.

Arms Trade (Indian Sub-continent)

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development which licence applications her Department has examined for arms exports to (a) Pakistan and (b) India since January 2000; and how many her Department (i) supported and (ii) opposed. [65450]

Clare Short: Along with the Foreign Office and the Ministry of Defence my Department provides advice to the Department of Trade and Industry on relevant export licence applications.

The advice given to the Department of Trade and Industry is exempt from disclosure under Part II, Section 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, as information whose disclosure would harm the frankness and candour of internal discussion.

Millennium Development Goals

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on progress towards the millennium development goals. [64702]

Clare Short: Latest forecasts from the World Bank suggest that globally, meeting the 2015 target of halving the proportion of people living in extreme poverty is attainable. There has been progress. During the 1990s, the proportion of people living on less than $1 a day in the developing world fell from 29 per cent. in 1990 to 23 per cent. in 1999. This was mainly due to the substantial progress made during the 1990s in east Asia and, in particular, China.

In the developing world, progress has also been made during the 1990s against almost all the other 2015 millennium development targets. The proportion of children completing a full course of primary school increased from 68 per cent. to 73 per cent.; the under-five mortality rate decreased from 88 to 84 deaths per 1,000 births; and the proportion of people with access to an improved water source increased from 73 per cent. to 79 per cent.

However, to meet all of the 2015 targets we must do more. The sub-Saharan African region presents the biggest challenge to meeting the 2015 targets. We therefore need to make an enormous effort internationally to accelerate progress in Africa.

A detailed description of progress towards all the 2015 targets is contained in a recent World Bank publication: "World Development Indicators 2002", which can be found at the following website: http://www.worldbank.org/data/wdi2002/worldview.pdf

Development Partner Countries

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if updated data on the gender disparity in secondary education in UK development partner countries have been published. [64955]

Clare Short: We expect updated data on gender disparity in secondary education in developing countries to be published by the World Bank within the next two months. We will then use it to update our reporting against our Public Service Agreement targets.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the nature of the problems with the data on primary education in UK development partner countries that are published by the World bank. [64981]

Clare Short: There are difficulties both in the coverage and the timeliness of primary education data compiled by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO), and published by the World bank, for some of the major UK development partner countries.

The problems with coverage which we have encountered in reporting against the Public Service Agreement targets are due partly to the difficulty of calculating net primary enrolment rates (ie proportion of children of primary school age in school), often due to lack of data on the ages of children in school. Gross enrolment data (which use the total number of children in school regardless of age) are relatively easy to obtain for most countries, but do not give a clear picture of the number of children who are out of school.

In some countries the reliability of the pupil data is also questionable due either to lack of technical capacity, poor school record keeping, or, in a few cases, political manipulation of the figures. Calculating net enrolment rates also requires figures for the population of school age children, which are often based on out-of-date census data. Where there are doubts about the reliability of either the pupil or population figures, UNESCO can often either decline to publish figures for a country, or revise earlier figures.

For most countries, it can take a long time for data produced at country level to be provided to international bodies (principally the UNESCO Institute for Statistics), be verified by them and published in international reports. For example, the latest officially published net primary enrolment figure for Uganda is 57 per cent. although we knew from our work in country that the figure is much higher and is probably over 85 per cent. This published figure is more than five years old.

We are working at country level and with the World bank and UNESCO Institute of Statistics to improve the availability of timely data on primary education to assist with policy making, both for developing countries and for bilateral donors and the international community.

United Nations Development Programme

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the progress of the work of the United Nations Development Programme in HIV/AIDS. [64979]

Clare Short: UNDP, as one of the co-sponsoring organisations of the joint UN programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS), plays an important role in helping create enabling policy, legislative and resource environments for an effective multisectoral response to the epidemic. UNDP's key areas for action lie in supporting developing countries to take effective leadership, in developing capacity for action, promoting a rights-based approach and in impact mitigation.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the progress of the work of the United Nations Development Programme in energy and the environment. [64977]

Clare Short: DFID is providing support to UNDP's Poverty and Environment initiative, which aims to ensure that 'win-win' options for reducing poverty while improving the environment are reflected in the strategies and practices of developing country Governments and their international partners. We are supportive of the work of UNDP as an implementing agency of the Global Environment Facility and of the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer. We are also supportive of UNDP's co-sponsorship of Energy Sector Management Programme (ESMAP) and their work in the Global Village Energy Partnership.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with representatives of the United Nations Development Programme about the progress of its work on poverty reduction. [64687]

Clare Short: I met UNDP's Administrator, Mark Malloch Brown, in Monterrey in March. We discussed a range of issues, including UNDP's work to promote the Millennium Development Goals for poverty reduction.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with representatives of the United Nations Development Programme about the progress of its work on democratic governance. [64695]

Clare Short: Democratic Governance is one of UNDP's six priority action areas, and an area that DFID also prioritises in its work. I last had discussions with UNDP's administrator, Mark Malloch Brown, on this and other issues at the UN's Conference on Financing for Development (FfD) in Monterrey in March 2002.

My officials work closely with UNDP colleagues on democratic governance programmes in a number of partner countries. There is also regular contact between headquarters staff. For example, last month DFID's Chief Governance Adviser and other governance advisers met with the resident experts working at UNDP's newly established Thematic Facility on Governance, based in Oslo, Norway.

I have also accepted an invitation from UNDP to speak at the launch in July of their 2002 Human Development Report which has as its main theme the examination of the challenges of democratic governance and development.

Afghanistan

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the withdrawal of female foreign aid workers from field operations in northern Afghanistan. [65726]

Clare Short: We are concerned about reports of insecurity in northern Afghanistan, including sexual attacks on women aid workers. The United Nations temporarily suspended the involvement of female staff on field missions in the north, but this suspension has now been lifted. Some non-governmental organisations have withdrawn staff as a precautionary measure. We support the actions of the Special Representative of the United Nations Secretary General, Lakhdar Brahimi, who has written to President Karzai, and visited the north to discuss security issues with the various factions.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her Department's response has been to the (a) World Food Programme and (b) UNHCR donor appeals for Afghanistan. [65553]

Clare Short: The UN World Food Programme's (WFP) current appeal is for $285 million (approximately £204 million) to feed up to 9.8 million people for nine months. Since October 2001, my Department has contributed £7 million towards WFP's operations inside Afghanistan—for both direct procurement and transportation of food, technical support and logistical support to help speed up the movement of food aid into the country.

We have also provided £3 million to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) in response to its $271 million (approximately £194 million) appeal to support its operations for refugees in the region. This has included technical personnel, material and financial support.

We have allocated a further £2 million each to WFP and UNHCR, which will be disbursed shortly.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much of the financial assistance committed by the United Kingdom Government to the reconstruction of Afghanistan has been disbursed since April, broken down by UN agency. [65555]

Clare Short: Since April the UK has given £5 million to the Afghanistan Reconstruction Trust Fund, the first donor to do so. In addition we have allocated over £10 million to UNAMA, UNDP, UNHCR, WFP, UNICEF and WHO and are currently in discussion with them to identify where the money might best be used. We are also in the process of disbursing £15 million to a range of NGOs, quick-impact projects and to the Afghan Authority for the Co-ordination of Assistance.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her assessment is of the food security situation in Afghanistan. [65554]

Clare Short: The food security situation throughout Afghanistan remains grave, as a result of decades of conflict and four years of drought. These shocks have overwhelmed the capacity of Afghan communities to cope with the loss of agriculture and livestock production, unemployment and burgeoning debt burdens. Afghanistan currently meets less than half of its national grain requirements, and around half its population is dependent on food aid. However, improved security and political stability will help provide a better environment for the efforts to improve food security in the country. Since October 2001, my Department has contributed £7 million to the World Food Programme and £2 million to the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, for the provision of both emergency food aid and measures to increase food security.

Food Shortage (Southern Africa)

Mr. Laxton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to tackle the shortage of food in southern Africa. [64798]

Clare Short: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) on 17 June 2002, Official Report, columns 58–59W.

Cotonou Agreement

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the improvements in the development, trade and political relationship between the EU and Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific that will be achieved by the Cotonou Agreement. [64693]

Clare Short: The ACP-EU Partnership Agreement, often referred to as the Cotonou Agreement, was signed in Cotonou on 23 June 2000. Pending ratification by all member states and two thirds of the ACP states, it will enter into effect.

The Cotonou Agreement is the successor to the Lomé Conventions. It marks the most important revision of the relationship between EU and the ACP states since the first Lomé Convention was signed in 1975. It provides an overall framework for political dialogue, development co-operation and trade relations with 78 developing countries. Together with the wider on-going reform of EC development assistance, the Cotonou Agreement is a step towards improving the European Community contribution to the meeting of the millennium development goals.

Most importantly, the Cotonou Agreement has established poverty reduction as its central aim. Respect for human rights, democratic principles and the rule of law together with the importance of good governance underpin the agreement and have been given much more emphasis than in past relations. A process for consultations and possible action has been defined if these basic elements of the agreement have been breached. The principle of partnership between EU and ACP states has also been reaffirmed in the agreement, supporting the emphasis on mutual responsibility and dialogue. Likewise, consultations with civil society in all aspects of the implementation of the agreement have been put to the fore.

One of the most important aspects of Cotonou is the new trade deal between EU and the ACP, whereby ACP's access to the EU market will be maximised while promoting their gradual integration into the global economy. The EU is now committed to open its markets to a substantial block of developing countries.

EU Committees

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the EU Committee on implementation of the programme of assistance to promote the transition to a market economy and to strengthen democracy and the rule of law in the partner states of eastern Europe and central Asia (Tacis) is next due to meet; whether representatives of the Scottish Executive have been members of it; and if she will make a statement. [64907]

Clare Short: The next meeting of the Tacis Committee is scheduled for 24 July 2002.

Schedule 5 of the 1998 Scottish Act sets out areas of policy that are reserved, that is, where responsibility has not been devolved to the Scottish Executive. Section 7(1) of schedule 5 states:

> "International relations, including relations with territories outside the United Kingdom, the European Communities (and their institutions) and other international organisations, regulation of international trade, and international development assistance and co-operation are reserved matters".

The United Kingdom is represented on the Tacis Committee by officials from my Department and by members of staff from the United Kingdom Permanent Representation to the European Union in Brussels.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the EU Committee on financial and technical assistance and economic cooperation with developing countries in Asia and Latin America is next due to meet, what the UK representation is on it, whether representatives of the Scottish Executive have been members of it; and if she will make a statement. [64906]

Clare Short: The next meeting of the EU Committee on financial and technical assistance and economic co-operation with developing countries in Asia and Latin America (ALA) is scheduled for 18 July 2002.

Schedule 5 of the 1998 Scottish Act sets out areas of policy that are reserved, that is, where responsibility has not been devolved to the Scottish Executive. Section 7 (1) of Schedule 5 states:

> "International relations, including relations with territories outside the United Kingdom, the European Communities (and their institutions) and other international organisations, regulation of international trade, and international development assistance and co-operation are reserved matters."

The United Kingdom is represented on the ALA Committee by officials from the Department for International Development.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the EU MED Committee (financial and technical cooperation between the Community and Mediterranean non-member countries) is next due to meet; whether representatives of the Scottish Executive have been members of it; and if she will make a statement. [64909]

Clare Short: The next meeting of the EU MED Committee is scheduled for 17 July 2002.

Schedule 5 of the 1998 Scottish Act sets out areas of policy that are reserved, that is, where responsibility has not been devolved to the Scottish Executive. Section 7 (1) of Schedule 5 states:

> "International relations, including relations with territories outside the United Kingdom, the European Communities (and their institutions) and other international organisations, regulation of international trade, and international development assistance and co-operation are reserved matters."

The United Kingdom is represented on the MED Committee by officials from the Department for International Development.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the EU Committee on aid for Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia is next due to meet; whether representatives of the Scottish Executive have been members of it; and if she will make a statement. [64908]

Clare Short: The next meeting of the EU CARDS Committee on aid for Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia is scheduled for 24 October 2002.

Schedule 5 of the 1998 Scottish Act sets out areas of policy that are reserved, that is, where responsibility has not been devolved to the Scottish Executive. Section 7 (1) of Schedule 5 states:

> "International relations, including relations with territories outside the United Kingdom, the European Communities (and their institutions) and other international organisations, regulation of international trade, and international development assistance and co-operation are reserved matters."

The United Kingdom is represented on the CARDS Committee by officials from the Department for International Development.

Commission on Intellectual Property Rights

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the conclusions were of the Commission on Intellectual Property Rights. [65552]

Clare Short: The Commission on Intellectual Property Rights report is due to be launched in mid-September, DFID will receive an embargoed copy one week prior to this. Conclusions will not be publicised before the launch date.

Western Sahara

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what support has been given in each of the past five years to the refugee camps of the Sahrawi people of the Western Sahara. [64860]

Clare Short: Our support to the refugees from the Western Sahara is mostly channelled through the European Commission's Humanitarian aid Office (ECHO).

Total ECHO assistance to Sahrawi refugees in the Western Sahara

	Euro 000
1997	7,000
1998	17,200
1999	7,500
2000	13,935
2001	15,570

Source:
ECHO Global Plan 2002.

Approximately 19 per cent. of this support is attributable to contributions from the UK.

We also contribute to the budgets of UNHCR and WFP who cooperate closely with ECHO in providing support to the Sahrawi refugees. In addition in 1997–98 we provided £79,000 in direct humanitarian assistance.

Poverty

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the comprehensiveness of her Department's poverty reduction strategies in recognising the multidimensional nature of poverty. [64697]

Clare Short: The Government's first and second White Papers on International Development clearly recognise the multidimensional nature of poverty and commit us to supporting the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). My Department has set out comprehensive strategy papers for achieving the MDGs and thus reducing poverty. These papers provide DFID with the necessary skills and knowledge it needs to engage with partner government and support their efforts to implement nationally owned and administered plans for reducing poverty.

HEALTH

Heroin

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will commission a report on the average waiting time for treatment for heroin addiction in (a) 1997 and (b) 2002 in (i) Sunderland, (ii) Manchester, (iii) Birmingham, (iv) Teesside and (v) Central London; and if he will make a statement. [63771]

Ms Blears: The Department commissioned an England-wide research project into waiting times for substitute prescribing and in-patient detoxification for opiate users in 2000. The project is due to report this summer.

Average waiting times for drug treatment services in 2001 in the areas requested are given in the table. This is the latest data available, and comparative data are not available for earlier years.

[1] Information not supplied

The national treatment agency for substance misuse issued waiting times guidance to drug action teams in March 2002. This sets out recommended maximum waiting times for each type of treatment, and the national treatment agency is monitoring the progress of drug action teams in working towards these. In April 2002, each health authority area received an uplift in central funding for drug treatment of at least 30 per cent. to support this work.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) with reference to the announcement by his Department on 4 February, regarding the assessment of multiple sclerosis patients, who will be responsible for arranging the tests; [54025]

(2) when the payment by results agreement on drugs for treating multiple sclerosis will come into effect. [54024]

Ms Blears: The UK health departments have reached agreement with manufacturers on a risk-sharing scheme for the supply of disease modifying treatments for multiple sclerosis on the national health service to patients who meet criteria set by the Association of British Neurologists (ABN). Full details of the scheme were issued in Health Service Circular (HSC) 2002/004 on 4 February 2002. The scheme started on 6 May 2002 for those centres with the appropriate infrastructure in place. Some centres will start later depending on the work that has to be undertaken to set up specialist clinics.

The scheme involves groups of patients being specifically monitored over the lifetime of the scheme to confirm the cost-effectiveness of these treatments. Monitoring of patients and potential price adjustments under the scheme are expected to continue over 10 years.

The ABN recommends that initial assessments be undertaken by designated consultants to whom patients should be referred by other neurologists, not directly by general practitioners. The precise service arrangements and referral protocols will be for local agreement taking into account the current spread of specialist services.

Acquired Brain Injury

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to ensure that rehabilitation services for those with acquired brain injury are maintained in advance of the National Service Framework provision; [56437]

(2) what plans he has to improve access to vocational rehabilitation for individuals with acquired brain injury. [56434]

Jacqui Smith: Recently announced budget settlements for the national health service (annual average increase of 7.5 per cent. above inflation over the five years 2003–04 to 2007–08) and personal social services (PSS) (annual average increase of 6.0 per cent. above inflation over the three years 2003–04 to 2005–06), will provide the investment needed to support services which best meet patients' and users' needs.

The national service framework for long-term conditions and the clinical guideline on the initial assessment, management and first referral of patients with head injury that the National Institute for Clinical Excellence is developing will help improve access to rehabilitation services for people with acquired brain injury generally.

The Government are investing in job retention and rehabilitation pilots which will evaluate the relative effectiveness of health and employment strategies in supporting people with long-term conditions to remain in or return to work.

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 4 February 2002, Official Report, column 788W, what plans he has to assess the number of people who successfully return to work following a brain injury. [56468]

Jacqui Smith: The Department does not plan on assessing the number of people who return to work after a head injury.

However, jobcentre plus management information systems monitor the outcomes (including job entries) of its services and programmes for disabled people including those with brain injury.

We are keen to help ensure that disabled people, including those with head injury, are able to return to work whenever possible. Currently local authorities are taking the lead on joint investment plans on the welfare to work for disabled people initiative. The idea of these plans is to provide effective and joined-up services for disabled people who want to work, to stay in work, or to move closer to the world of work.

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent discussions he has had with the Department of Work and Pensions in relation to vocational rehabilitation for individuals with acquired brain injury. [56432]

Jacqui Smith: The Department has held no discussions with the Department of Work and Pensions (DWP) specifically in relation to vocational rehabilitation for individuals with acquired brain injury. However, the Department is playing an active role in agenda, working in partnership with DWP on job retention and rehabilitation pilots, health and work and joint investment plans for disabled people.

Head Injury

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those meetings that have taken place in the last 12 months with the voluntary and professional organisations involved in rehabilitation services for people with head injury. [56501]

Jacqui Smith: Last November, the Department held a scoping workshop to inform the development of the national service framework (NSF) for long-term conditions. A wide range of stakeholders, including professional and voluntary organisations, patients and service users, carers and experts attended the workshop. This included those with a particular interest in rehabilitation service for people with head injury, including Headway, the UK acquired brain injury forum (UKABIF), and the British society of rehabilitation medicine (BSRM).

The NSF project team has also visited hospital based rehabilitation units across England including Leeds, London, Cambridge and Wakefield.

Additionally, departmental officials have held separate meetings with representatives of Headway (October 2001 and April 2002) and the UKABIF (April 2002).

Care Homes

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when care home providers received the requests for information and documents required by the care home regulations; and by which date the providers were required to respond. [60797]

Jacqui Smith: The Care Homes Regulations 2001 were laid before Parliament on 12 December 2001 and came into effect on 1 April 2002. The regulations were contained in booklets setting out the national minimum standards for care homes for older people and for care homes for younger adults and adult placements, published by the Department. In March 2002, the Department issued order forms along with guidance on the Care Standards Act directly to providers who were already registered. The National Care Standards Commission issued, from February 2002, application packs to providers not previously registered and new to regulation. Those applying to register care homes were required to respond by 31 March 2002. As some delays occurred in issuing registration packs, the National Care Standards Commission has not penalised any care home which has responded after that date.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will investigate the level of service available to care home owners from (a) the National Care Standards Commission and (b) the Criminal Records Bureau. [65000]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 27 June 2002]: I am satisfied that the National Care Standards Commission has made good progress in getting up to speed with its responsibilities, taking account of its extremely large initial workload and the transitional arrangements relating to the commission's establishment. The Department has regular formal and informal monitoring arrangements in respect of the commission's performance.

Measures are being taken to overcome the early operating difficulties experienced by the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB), which have led to delays in responding to applications for disclosures. We are determined that the CRB will be in a position as soon as possible to meet the high standards of service that it has made clear it will deliver to its customers. The short-term implications for particular service areas using the CRB service are being closely monitored.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when there will be an investigation of the impact of inspection costs linked to the transfer of free nursing care to care homes. [65001]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The Department is currently consulting on amendments to the Care Homes Regulations 2001. There are no specific plans to investigate the inspection costs to the National Care Standards Commission as a result of these. The overall costs of inspection are monitored routinely by the Department.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the differences between the full costs of operating efficient, good quality care in care homes and the average fees paid by local authorities. [64270]

Jacqui Smith: In October 2001 the Government published an agreement, "Building Capacity and Partnership in Care", which states that: "Fee setting must take into account the legitimate current and future costs faced by providers as well as the factors that affect these costs and the potential for improving performance and more effective ways of working". We expect councils to follow this advice when setting the costs of care. According to independent consultants, Laing and Buisson, the vast majority of councils have recently agreed fee increases in excess of 3 per cent. and some councils have agreed much higher increases—one third of councils increased fees by in excess of 10 per cent.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce a care home modernisation grant payable to local authorities to be paid in line with local care homes' compliance with national minimal standards. [64271]

Jacqui Smith: Decisions about the distribution of resources to local councils for personal social services are likely to be announced later this year.

NHS Cancer Plan

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 10 May 2002, Official Report, column 401W, on the NHS Cancer Plan, what consultations he undertook and what representations he received prior to developing the two-week-wait target for cancer diagnosis in the NHS Cancer Plan. [60818]

Ms Blears: A cancer waiting times multi-disciplinary working group met in 1997. The group made recommendations to improve access to cancer services including the need to set specific waiting time targets for all stages of the patient journey. The first of these was the introduction of the two week out-patient waiting times standard. The NHS Cancer Plan introduced further targets to reduce the time patients have to wait for diagnosis and treatment.

Weight

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether overweight and obesity has decreased since the setting of milestones for its reduction within the national health service framework for coronary heart disease. [61475]

Ms Blears: The annual health survey for England provides information on the prevalence of overweight and obesity for the general population. Based on figures from the health survey for England 2000, the year for which the latest data are available, 45 per cent. of men are overweight and 21 per cent. obese, and 34 per cent. of women are overweight and 21 per cent. obese.

The national service framework for coronary heart disease was published in March 2000. Pending the publication of data for the years 2001 and 2002 no information exists to determine the national impact of the milestones.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has collated on the health promotion milestones set within the national service framework for coronary heart disease in relation to obesity and overweight. [61478]

Ms Blears: It is the role of strategic health authorities to manage the performance of primary care trusts against the milestones of national service frameworks (NSF).

However the Department has commissioned work to review local activity relevant to the prevention aspects of the national service framework for coronary heart disease.

The results suggest that implementation of local prevention programmes and the availability of quantitative data in response to the NSF has been variable. As a first step in addressing this the Department is preparing a handbook aimed at helping primary care professionals to deliver the NSFs.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many registered patients in England had a recorded body mass index of above 35 in (a) April 2001 and (b) April 2002. [61474]

Ms Blears: Although we do not hold data centrally on the body mass index (BMI) of registered patients, data are available on the BMI of the general population. The health survey for England for the year 2000 provides the most up to date information on the prevalence of overweight (BMI 25–30) and obesity (BMI over 30) among UK adults. The Survey found that 45 per cent. of men are overweight and 21 per cent. obese, and 34 per cent. of women are overweight and 21 per cent. obese.

The national centre for social research hold data for BMI above 35 but these data are not published as part of the health survey for England.

Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he and Ministers in his Department have had with representatives of the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health in the last three months. [61455]

Jacqui Smith: The then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Public Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my noble Friend the Lord Hunt of Kings Heath, met Professor David Hall, President of the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health on 19 March this year to discuss neonatal care.

Also on the 23 April this year I met with the Children's Taskforce.

Home-based Care

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people the Government estimate are in care homes but who could be treated in their own homes; and what targets they have for increasing capacity for home-based care. [61435]

Jacqui Smith: The NHS Plan, published in July 2000, set a target to increase by 2004 the numbers of people helped to live in their own home by 50,000 through home care and other support.

The Department does not collect information about people currently in care homes, who might be cared for in their own home.

Chiropody

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the findings of Feet First II were; and if he will make a statement on his response to the review. [61841]

Jacqui Smith: We currently have no plans to publish any findings from the review of "Feet First".

In April 2001 the then Minister responsible for the policy area, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), made a statement about the review in his response to a question from the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell). I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 10 April 2001, Official Report, volume 366, column 604W.

Asthma

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the trend in the incidence of asthma in children. [61857]

Jacqui Smith: The reasons for the increase in the prevalence of asthma among children (and adults) particularly over the past 30 years are largely unknown and are likely to be due to a number of different factors including an over-sensitivity to substances that irritate the airways, and deterioration in air quality

Due to the rise in the prevalence of asthma and the fact that the causes remain unknown, the Government have and continue to sponsor research in this area. Research is continuing both on asthma in general and on possible links between outdoor and indoor air pollution and asthma. The Medical Research Council always welcomes high quality applications from the scientific community for support into any aspect of biomedical research and these are judged in open competition with other demands on funding. The Department's spend on directly commissioned research projects on asthma since 1997 is an estimated £7.24 million.

The national service framework (NSF) for children will be setting standards to improve the health and healthcare of children and young people. Asthma will be considered in depth from prevention through to an acute attack within the work on the NSF.

GPs

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are served, on average, by each general practitioner in the North West. [63498]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is shown in the list.

North West

1. NHS Plan GPs—3,722
2. Unrestricted principals and equivalents (UPEs)—3,595
3. Population—6,608,382

NHS Plan GPs per 100,000 population—56. 3

UPEs per 100,000 population—54.4

Notes:

1. NHS plan GPs include GMS unrestricted principals, PMS contracted GPs, PMS salaried GPs, restricted principals, assistants, salaried doctors (para. 52 of the statement of fees and allowances) and PMS others;

2. UPEs include GMS unrestricted principals, PMS contracted GPs and PMS salaried GPs; and population data based on 2,000 ONS population projections; and

3. Population data based on 2,000 ONS population projections.

Herbal Remedies

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths occurred in each of the past five years as a result of the use of traditional or herbal remedies. [63822]

Ms Blears: It is not possible reliably to estimate the number of deaths attributable to the use of traditional or herbal remedies.

The yellow card scheme provides for voluntary reporting of suspected adverse drug reactions by doctors, dentists, coroners and pharmacists. It was extended to include all herbal products in October 1996.

The table provides details of the number of reports received each year since 1997 in relation to herbal products as well as the number of reports with a fatal outcome.

Year received	Total number of report	Number with a fatal outcome
2000	139	1
2001	74	1

A report of a suspected reaction does not necessarily mean that it was caused by the medicine. As the scheme is voluntary, not all adverse reactions are reported.

It is generally recognised that the reporting rate for medicines supplied over the counter is lower than for prescription medicines. Therefore, data obtained on suspected adverse reactions associated with herbal medicines through the yellow card scheme, cannot be directly compared to reporting for licensed pharmaceutical medicines. With herbal medicines in particular, consumers often do not tell their general practitioner or pharmacist that they are taking a herbal remedy.

Mencap

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received recently from Mencap about housing for older people with learning disabilities; and if he will make a statement. [64473]

Jacqui Smith: We recognise that there is particular concern about the position of people with learning disabilities living with older carers aged 70 and over. They and their families must be able to plan for the future in good time. Promoting supported living for older people with learning disabilities is one of the priorities for both the revenue and capital elements of the £42 million learning disability development fund, announced in the White Paper "Valuing People: A New Strategy for Learning Disability for the 21st Century" published in March 2001. The fund has been made available to the new learning disability partnership boards, now established in each local authority area. Each partnership board has produced a local plan to improve services for people with learning disabilities and their families.

I have received a copy of Mencap's report, "The Housing Timebomb" (June 2002), which considers housing, care and support issues affecting people with learning disabilities living with older parents. We will consider the report and its recommendations carefully.

Audiology Services

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to spend more than the £20 million investment in audiology services announced on 24 December 2001. [65084]

Jacqui Smith: Since 2000–01, we have invested £30.75 million in modernising hearing aid services, including the provision of digital hearing aids. Recently a team led by James Strachan, chief executive of Royal National Institute for the Deaf, has been successful in negotiating a significant reduction in the cost to the national health service of purchasing digital hearing aids. These price reductions will enable the rollout of modernised services to proceed more quickly.

Health Action Zone (Cumbria)

Dr. Jack Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what policy initiatives have been introduced by the Health Action Zone in Cumbria; what progress has been made in identifying problems needing special attention; and if he will make a statement. [64855]

Jacqui Smith: Over the last year the ethos of the North Cumbria health action has changed following the development of local health groups. These groups determine the needs of their respective areas and the appropriate degree of resources.

A number of projects have been funded by the local health group in Copeland over the last 12 months. These include:

Welfare advice in primary care;

A physical activity directory;

A healthy communities worker;

Debt advice service;

A community cardiac rehabilitation programme manager;

Howgill community garden;

A smoking cessation adviser; as well as a number of smaller local projects such as the;

Aqua aerobics in Mirehouse and healthy eating and physical activity in Distington.

Private Finance Initiative (Bradford)

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the status is of the Bradford Hospital Trust PFI bid to redevelop Bradford Royal Infirmary and St. Luke's Hospital. [64868]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Bradford Hospitals National Health Service Trust is currently preparing their outline business case for this scheme. Subject to its approval, the trust is expected to go out to tender by placing an Official Journal of the European Community notice early next year.

Care Provision

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish statistics for levels for the provision of care, broken down by area. [65016]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The Department publishes a wide range of health and social care statistics for relevant areas and some of these statistics are available broken down by level of care. As well as printed publications available in the Library, these statistics may be found on the Department's website.

The address for health care statistics is: www.doh.gov.uk/public/pub_health_care.htm.

The address for social care statistics is: www.doh.gov.uk/public/pub_social_care.htm.

Figures on national health service in-patient care are available for a range of areas from the hospital episode statistics (HES) database and may be found at the HES website at: www.doh.gov.uk/hes/index.html.

Stroke

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals have not been equipped with stroke units; and in which areas they are. [60133]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 12 June 2002]: Stroke sentinel audits 1999–2001 carried out by the Royal College of Physicians, showed that the number of people treated in a stroke unit had increased. However, none of the data identify individual hospitals. The next audit will be available later this year.

The monitoring of the national service framework stroke standard, April 2002 milestone, requiring the development of integrated stroke services will be available shortly.

Fostering

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many foster parents were registered by (a) region and (b) health authority in each of the last five years. [61355]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 17 June 2002]: The information available is shown in the table.

Private Medical Insurance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what statistics his Department holds on the coverage of private medical insurance for over-65s. [59002]

Ruth Kelly [holding answer 24 May 2002]: I have been asked to reply.

None.

Health Checks (Over-75s)

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment has been made of the effectiveness of over-75 health checks. [56049]

Jacqui Smith: The Medical Research Council has been funding a trial of assessment and management of elderly people in the community since 1994. The Department has contributed towards the funding of this study. The study is being conducted in over 100 general practitioners practices in the UK covering nearly 33,000 people aged 75 years or over registered with participating practices. It will determine both the cost effectiveness of these different strategies of assessment and management and their effectiveness as measured by mortality, hospital admissions and quality of life. Findings will be available in autumn 2002.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Re-offending

Mr. Ross: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what progress the Social Exclusion Unit has made on its project on reducing re-offending by ex-prisoners. [65921]

Mrs. Roche: The Social Exclusion Unit has published its report on reducing re-offending by ex-prisoners today.

The report sets out the enormous cost, both in financial and human terms, of re-offending by ex-prisoners and makes recommendations for reducing the risk of re-offending in the future.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

Asbestos

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what requirement there is for people looking to sell their houses to remove asbestos from roofing before doing so; and if he will make a statement. [64442]

Mr. Leslie: There is no such requirement. Our proposals to require sellers and their agents to market homes with a seller's pack will help raise the awareness of sellers and buyers. The seller's pack will include a home condition report that will disclose the presence of asbestos where it is a safety hazard and is apparent from a visual inspection of the property. The necessary legislation will be introduced as soon as parliamentary time allows.

London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority

Angela Watkinson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if a further bid will be considered for PFI credits for an integrated clothing project by the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority; and for what reason the original bid was refused. [64904]

Mr. Raynsford: The Authority's bid, which was made on behalf of a number of fire authorities, was assessed according to the criteria set out in Fire Service Circular 3/2001, dated 14 February 2001, a copy of which is in the Library. It did not score as highly as some of the other bids received. Unsuccessful bidders were given feedback on their bids. Any future bid in respect of this project would fall to be considered under the criteria attached to that bidding round.

Planning

Mr. Norman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister which organisations Baker Associates consulted when preparing a consultation brief for the Department on possible changes to the Use Classes Order and Temporary Uses Provisions of the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995. [64591]

Mr. McNulty: The research carried out by Baker Associates included: a survey sent to all local planning authorities in England, in-depth case studies involving the views of a wide range of participants, and seminars and workshops at which developing ideas were tested. The research report does not include a list of all the organisations involved in the study. Nor does the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister hold this information centrally.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister for what reason Baker Associates were chosen, and what qualifications they have, to carry out the original research in preparing a consultation brief for the Department on possible changes to the Use Classes Order and Temporary Uses Provisions of the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995. [64592]

Mr. McNulty: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister places its research contracts by competitive tender based on a contractor's technical capacity to carry out the work.

Social Housing Grant

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much social housing grant has been spent by (a) the Housing Corporation and (b) local authorities in each region in each year since 1996–97. [63906]

Mr. McNulty: The following tables (rounded to one decimal place) show the Housing Corporation Approved Development Programme (ADP) expenditure and Local Authority Social Housing Grant (LASHG) for the years 1996–97 to 2001–02.

Wind Farms

Mr. Drew: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many wind turbine applications there have been in each of the last three years, broken down by planning authority; and how many of these were successful. [65020]

Mr. McNulty: The information requested is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Planning Green Paper

Mr. Drew: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many responses he has received to the Planning Green Paper; and how many of these were from organisations. [65021]

Mr. McNulty: 16,230 responses were received to the Green Paper. The Smith and Williamson report comprised a detailed analysis of the 10,417 responses using the standard form, and includes a breakdown by interest group. A copy is available in the House Library. Further information is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Regional Assemblies

Margaret Moran: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what measures he intends to take to ensure that equality issues are integral to the work of regional assemblies. [65182]

Mr. Raynsford: As stated in paragraph 7.17 of the Regional Governance White Paper, "Your Region, Your Choice", we are proposing that elected regional assemblies should be under a duty to exercise their general powers with due regard to the principle of equal opportunity for all (and to report annually on progress in fulfilling this duty); to eliminate unlawful discrimination; and to have regard to the need to promote equal opportunities for all persons irrespective of their race, gender, disability, age, sexual orientation or religion.

Margaret Moran: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what measures he intends to take to ensure equal representation of women on regional assemblies. [65183]

Mr. Raynsford: As stated in para 7.16 of the Regional Governance White Paper, "Your Region, Your Choice", the Government wants to encourage women, and other traditionally under-represented groups, to stand for election to regional assemblies. We are proposing that assembly members should be elected by the Additional Member System of Proportional Representation, which can facilitate diversity in the selection of candidates by political parties. We are also planning to apply the Sex Discrimination (Election Candidates) Act 2001 to regional assembly elections, so that a political party can choose to adopt positive measures that aim to reduce inequality in the numbers of men and women elected as candidates to the party.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Child Abductions

Keith Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to her answer of 20 June 2002, Official Report, column 530W, on child abductions, to which countries the children were abducted. [65277]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Further to my answer on 20 June 2002, Official Report, column 530W, on child abductions, the information is in the table.

Contact Centres

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many contact centres for absent parents and children there have been in England over the last five years, broken down by (a) health authority and (b) region. [64522]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Child contact centres are run by the voluntary sector. No current data are kept on how many child contact centres exist or their location. The Child Contact Centre Working Group, which is facilitated by the LCD, will be undertaking a mapping exercise of child contact centre service provision in England and Wales. 264 child contact centres in England are currently affiliated to the National Association of Child Contact Centres (NACCC). The Government are working in partnership with NACCC, through the working group, to develop standards for child contact centres and a national network of child contact centres, which will provide safe and meaningful contact between children and their non-resident parent.

Annual Leave

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what the average annual leave entitlement is for staff in her Department in 2002. [64655]

Ms Rosie Winterton: (a) The annual leave entitlements for staff below the Senior Civil Service in LCD and its agencies is as follows.

LCD Headquarters and Associated Offices, and the Public Guardianship Office

Grades AA to SEO and equivalent

22 days on entry to the civil service;

25 days after one year's service;

30 days after 10 years' service.

Grades 7 and 6 and equivalent

25 days on entry;

30 days after 10 years.

Court Service

Spans 1–9 (AA to Grade 6)

22 days on entry;

25 days after 1 year,

30 days after 10 years.

(b) The annual leave entitlement for members of the Senior Civil Service is currently set by the Cabinet Office at 30 days.

The actual average annual leave entitlement could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Entertainment Costs

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what the cost was of the Department's 2001 staff Christmas party; and how many people attended. [61658]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Lord Chancellor's Department 2001 Christmas party was not paid for by the Department.

Road Traffic Accidents

Mr. Drew: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if she will make a statement on the role of hearing costs in settlements resulting from serious road traffic accidents. [65025]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The settling of a dispute of any kind is a private matter between the parties and the court has no role in determining the basis on which the parties settle. Where the parties to a dispute have reached an agreement on all issues, including which party is to pay costs, but have not agreed the amount of those costs, then if they both agree, they may start "costs only" proceedings, whereby the court will determine the level of costs payable. This procedure was introduced in July 2000.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what discussions she has had with representatives of the (a) legal profession and (b) insurance industry on bringing quicker settlements to cases where a serious injury has been sustained as a result of a road traffic accident. [65024]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Ministers and officials of this Department have regular discussions with both the legal profession and the insurance industry. However, since the introduction of the Civil Procedure Rules in April 1999, the specific issue of quicker settlement of disputes concerning injuries sustained in a road traffic accident has not been discussed.

Judicial Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many judicial appointments she has made since 1 May 1997 in each category; and how many are (a) women, (b) black and (c) Asian. [63803]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The table shows the number of appointments in the main categories of the judiciary made between 1 May 1997 and 21 June 2002. It shows the total number, the number of women judges and those judges who have stated on an ethnic monitoring questionnaire that they are of black or Asian origin.

The Lord Chancellor is committed to the principles of equality of opportunity and appointment on merit and is keen to see an increasingly diverse judiciary. The number of women and minority ethnic judges should be seen in the context of the composition of the profession from which judges are drawn. In 2000–01 5.4 per cent. of barristers with over 15 years' experience were of ethnic minority origin (there were no comparable figures for solicitors) and 14.4 per cent. of barristers with over 15 years' experience were women and 15.5 per cent. of solicitors with over 15 years' experience were women. The average length of time lawyers are in practice before being appointed to first rung judicial appointments is between 15 and 20 years. Those appointed to the more senior levels have much longer experience in the profession.

The proportion of ethnic minority and women judges in post has been steadily increasing over the years. For example, in April 1998 the proportion of women in the main tiers of the judiciary was 10.3 per cent. This had increased to 14.4 per cent. by April 2002. The proportion of ethnic minority judges in post in April 1998 was 1.6 per cent.; in April 2002 it was 2.3 per cent.

Part-time Legal Panel Members Appeals Tribunal[3]	767	257	5	9

[1] Those appointed on promotion from Assistant Recorder on merit, but not including those promoted automatically to Recordership because of the abolition of the post of Assistant Recorder. It also includes those appointed direct to Recordership under the new arrangements after April 2000.

[2] Those appointed as Assistant Recorders prior to the abolition of the post of Assistant Recorder in April 2000.

[3] Includes re-appointments.

Repossessed Homes

Bob Spink: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent assessment she has made of the effectiveness of the rules issued by the Law Society relating to the handling of surplus funds arising from the sale of repossessed homes and efforts to return such funds to the original mortgagee who is not a client of the solicitors who holds those funds. [63914]

Ms Rosie Winterton: None. But if the hon. Member wishes to pursue the matter, he should write to me setting out the substance of his concerns.

"Making Decisions"

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what consultations she had with (a) Right to Life, (b) Alert, (c) Care, (d) the Pro-Life Alliance and (e) the Hospice Movement, when preparing the document "Making Decisions: Helping People who have Difficulty Deciding for Themselves"; and if she will make a statement. [64446]

Ms Rosie Winterton: As part of the preparation of this guidance, groups who had specialist expertise in certain issues were contacted to confirm that the information given on these issues was factually correct, and accurately represented the current law on decision-making on behalf of mentally incapacitated adults. It was not possible in terms of time and resources to make contact with every group in the area of mental incapacity and the organisations listed were not consulted prior to publication. The consultation paper has, however, been sent to a wide audience, including Alert, Care, the Pro-Life Alliance and organisations within the Hospice Movement. The Government will consider all responses and amend the guidance as necessary to ensure that it reflects the needs and concerns of all mentally incapacitated adults and those who care for them.

Office for the Supervision of Solicitors

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) if she will make a statement about the operation of the OSS; [63802]

(2) what proposals she has concerning the operation of the Office for the Supervision of Solicitors. [64830]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The performance of the Office for the Supervision of Solicitors (OSS) has been in some respects disappointing. The Lord Chancellor has therefore asked the Legal Services Ombudsman to maintain increased oversight of the OSS and to report to him regularly on progress against a range of issues. He expects to receive the Ombudsman's report on the integrity of the data provided by the OSS and her advice as to future performance measures this autumn.

Immigration Appellate Authority

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many adjournments there have been in hearings dealt with by the IAA since January 2001; and of these how many have been requested by the (a) IAA, (b) Home Office, (c) appellant's representative and (d) appellant, respectively. [63459]

Ms Rosie Winterton: During the period 1 June 2001 to 31 May 2002, the IAA heard 84,254 cases; of these, 17,893 adjudicator hearings and 449 tribunal hearings were adjourned.

Figures prior to June 2001 are not available.

Information about which party requested the adjournment is not available, save and except as is implied by the statistics provided in answer PQ 63460.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the decision was taken to relocate the Immigration Appellate Authority court in Leeds; what options are being looked at for an alternative venue; what consultations have taken place with (a) users, (b) staff, (c) representatives and (d) interpreters; what she calculates the implications of this move are for the satellite courts; and when she expects to announce her decision. [64869]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The IAA is not currently planning to shut the existing hearing centre in Leeds—they are opening an additional centre in Bradford which was identified from possible options in the Yorkshire area. This is part of the publicised expansion of the IAA to deal with 6,000 asylum cases per month from November 2002. Consultation on the new site has taken place within the IAA, and with the Home Office and Legal Services Commission. Staff and adjudicators will be given the option of moving to the new site in Bradford if they wish to do so.

As part of the expansion of the IAA the emphasis has been placed on larger hearing centres. Small satellite courts, consisting of only one or two hearing rooms, have less flexibility in relation to listing and hence lower efficiency. As a result, it is intended that the IAA will cease to use its small satellite courts as the new centres come on stream. The hearing centre at Leeds is not, however, classified as a satellite court.

Announcements in respect of new hearing centres will be made once lease and contractual negotiations have progressed sufficiently to assure completion.

Correspondence

Keith Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what the average length of time is that her Department has taken to reply to hon. Members in the last 12 months. [65382]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The average length of time to reply to correspondence from hon. Members during the period 1 June 2001 to 31 May 2002 was 18.56 days. The Whitehall target for responding is 20 days.

Judges (Complaints)

Keith Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) how many complaints she has received about judges since 1 May 1997; [65380]

(2) how many letters of reprimand he has sent to judges since 1 May 1997. [65381]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave on 26 June 2002, Official Report, column 951W. Since that reply was prepared the Lord Chancellor has sent an additional letter reprimanding a judge, bringing the total to 24.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many statutory instruments have been (a) introduced, (b) removed and (c) amended by her Department since 1 January; and what the (i) cost and (ii) saving has been in each case. [64633]

Ms Rosie Winterton: A list of statutory instruments has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. It includes those originated by the Lord Chancellor's Department and signed by or on behalf of the Lord Chancellor since 1 January 2002, and also Orders in Council made during that period for which the Lord Chancellor's Department was responsible. A list of Northern Ireland statutory rules signed by or on behalf of the Lord Chancellor is also included. Where any such instrument amended or revoked another instrument, the name of the amended or revoked instrument is mentioned in the table.

Policy decisions implemented by secondary legislation may or may not result in costs on the one hand, or savings on the other. It is not possible, save at disproportionate cost, if at all, to attribute specific costs or savings to specific statutory instruments.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drugs

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the key performance indicators for drugs in prisons seek to make a differentiation between opiates and cannabis; and if he will make a statement. [61778]

Hilary Benn: The Prison Service's key performance indicator based on random mandatory drug tests does not separate drug types found. It provides a composite figure and as such is the best measure of overall drug misuse in prisons. Separate figures relating to the nine drug types tested are available and are used locally and nationally for management purposes.

New figures for 2001–02 will be available shortly and will be placed in the Library.

Custodial Sentences

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many London residents, broken down by ethnic origin and offence, were issued with a custodial sentence at magistrates courts in the last 12 months. [58906]

Hilary Benn: Information is not currently collected in the form requested.

Louis Farrakhan

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the ruling in the Court of Appeal concerning Louis Farrakhan. [54478]

Beverley Hughes: We were extremely pleased to have won this case in the Court of Appeal. This vindicates the view of my right hon. Friend, the Home Secretary and his predecessors that the Home Secretary has the right to exclude someone from the United Kingdom if it is considered that their presence is not conducive to good public order.

Ministerial Accommodation

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what publicly owned accommodation is made available to him in his official role; how many nights he has been in residence at each of these properties in the last 12 months; and what the total cost was of maintaining each of these properties in the last 12 months. [55094]

Mr. Blunkett [holding answer 9 May 2002]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on 28 February 2002, Official Report, column 1443W and my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) on 21 January 2002, Official Report, column 599W and 28 January 2002, Official Report, column 91W.

The Home Office leases one property, acquired for security reasons, as the London residence of the Home Secretary of the day.

The total running costs of this property in 2001–02 were £12,122 including utilities and ground rent of £7,100.

In addition, a major programme of cyclical refurbishment—the first for some years—is now largely complete. This was needed to maintain the repair and value of the property and to deal with the impact of substantial flood and storm damage. Subject to final bills, the estimated committed expenditure in 2001–02 was £85,000. Completion of this cycle of work will put the property on a sound footing for the future; no further major refurbishment work should be required.

European Border Management

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the first drafts of the European Commission Communication on European Border Management will be released. [57919]

Beverley Hughes: The communication from the Commission to the Council and the European Parliament towards integrated management of the external borders of the member states of the European Union was deposited for parliamentary scrutiny on 17 May 2002. The communication proposes the following action in the short and medium term:

A common corpus of legislation

A common and operational co-ordination mechanism

Common integrated risk analysis

Inter-operational personnel and analysis

Burden-sharing between the member states and the union.

The Government are supportive of closer co-operation between national border authorities of the European Union, which we believe is one of the ways to tackle the criminal networks responsible for human trafficking and illegal immigration. We are also keen to discuss practical ways of strengthening the European Union's external borders, in line with our frontiers protocol. We welcome the fact that the commission is responding to calls from member states for action in this area.

The Government will provide Parliament with detailed views on this document in its explanatory memorandum, which was submitted on the 29 May.

Conviction Rates

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress towards meeting the Government's pledge to bring 100,000 more criminals to justice. [56386]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 23 May 2002]: In the year ending March 2000, 1.1 million offences were brought to justice. In the year ending March 2001, this figure was 1.02 million. The most recent data (for the year ending November 2001) shows an improvement in performance. 9,900 more offences were brought to justice than in the year ending July 2001.

Domestic Violence

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women have been victims of domestic violence in each of the last five years. [59850]

Mr. Denham: Domestic violence is not separately identified in recorded crime statistics collected by the Home Office. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) collects figures from police forces on the number of recorded incidents of domestic violence. Incidents can be counted in the HMIC figures regardless of whether or not the incident is subsequently recorded as a crime, and all incidents initially recorded as domestic violence are counted regardless of the final outcome.

The British Crime Survey (BCS) can provide trend information on the number of incidents of domestic violence against women.

Number of BCS incidents of domestic violence against women, 1997 to 2000

Thousands

Year	Number
1997	583
1999	560
2000	354

Source:
1998, 2000 and 2001 British Crime Surveys

The 2001 British Crime Survey estimates that there were, in total 354,000 incidents of domestic violence against women in England and Wales in 2000. This was a decrease from the previous sweep, the 2000 BCS, which estimated there were 560,000 incidents against women in the year preceding that survey (1999). This in turn was a reduction from the 1998 BCS, which estimated that there were 583,000 incidents of domestic violence suffered by women in 1997 in England and Wales.

Young Offenders

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average length of time prisoners at Feltham (A and B) young offenders' prison spent locked in their cells each day was in (a) 1995, (b) 2000, (c) 2001 and (d) 2002 to date; and if he will make a statement. [61374]

Hilary Benn: The Prison Service collects information on average time unlocked at each establishment, but does not break those figures down below establishment level.

The average time unlocked for all prisoners at Feltham young offender institution (YOI) for the periods specified is given in the table.

	Average week day time unlocked at Feltham YOI
1995–96	7.9
2000–01	10.3
2001–02	8.0
April 2002	7.1

Criminal Justice System

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the work of the Criminal Justice Joint Planning Unit in relation to the development and testing of joint and shared performance measures and the date envisaged for the production of a set of indicators on criminal justice system priorities. [59658]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 12 June 2002]: The current criminal justice plan already contains joint objectives and public service agreement targets for the criminal justice system as a whole. These are the targets towards which the criminal justice agencies must collectively work.

The Criminal Justice Joint Planning Unit is currently working with the criminal justice agencies in Merseyside to examine the whole range of targets, investigate inconsistencies and develop a set of joint and shared performance measures for that area. Once they have been agreed, they will be further tested in a number of other criminal justice areas.

Our intention is that the shared indicators will be introduced into the next set of local criminal justice business plans during 2003–04.

Correspondence

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter of 8 May from the hon. Member for Northavon regarding Mr. Jason Davis and Ms Elaine Smith, a constituent. [61409]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 13 June 2002]: A reply to the hon. Member was dispatched on 10 June 2002. This was within the Prison Service's 20 working day target for ministerial correspondence.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he will reply to the letter to him dated 9 April from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. Rahemi Aminulah; [61680]

(2) when he will reply to the letter to him dated 22 April from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. Zakaria Hussein; [61686]

(3) when he will reply to the letter to him dated 22 April from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. S. Balekey. [61678]

Mr. Blunkett: I wrote to my right hon. Friend on 27 June 2002.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will provide an answer to the question tabled by the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton on 11 June regarding the letter to chief police officers Ref. 62195. [64607]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: I replied to the hon. Member's question on 25 June 2002, Official Report, column 841W. I apologise for the delay in responding.

Royal Prerogative of Mercy

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the review of the exercise of the Royal Prerogative of Mercy; what its findings have been; what action he plans to take; and if he will make a statement. [61339]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 17 June 2002]: Applications for the exercise of the Royal Prerogative of Mercy are rare. Each one is considered on its own merits. The review completed last year (which did not lead to any significant change of policy or practice) was conducted by means of communications between Ministers and officials, and legal advice to Ministers. The Code of Practice on Access to Government Information indicates that such internal discussion and advice is exempt from the commitments to provide information in that Code.

Justice and Home Affairs Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the outcome of the Justice and Home Affairs Council held on 13 and 14 June was; what the Government's stance on the issues discussed, including its voting record was; and if he will make a statement. [62932]

Mr. Blunkett: I together with my right hon. Friend the Deputy First Minister and Minster for Justice for Scotland, and my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Filkin, represented the United Kingdom at the Justice and Home Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 13 June.

A points

The A points were approved as in document 9825/02 PTS A 31 and ADD 1 and COR 1 (a copy of which has been placed in the Library), except points 23, 24, 25 and 45.

Terrorism

The Council noted a terrorism threat assessment document, Europol reports on security measures taken since 11 September and extremist terrorism, and a report on the current list of terrorist organisations. The Director of Europol reported on the work of the Europol Counter-Terrorism Task Force, noting that the provision of information to Europol had improved but remained insufficient and that more could be done to improve co-operation with the United States.

Activities of the Spanish presidency on the subject of violence against women, to be submitted by the Ministers of Education, Justice, Home Affairs and Health at forthcoming Councils:

The presidency presented a study on measures adopted by member states to combat violence against women and a guide to good practice to mitigate the effects of and eradicate violence against women.

Illegal immigration and external borders

During a general debate on illegal immigration and asylum, I called for the Seville European Council to deliver concrete results so that citizens could see the relevance of a European Union (EU) approach. I said that the message should not be one of fortress Europe but a coherent policy which opposed racism, welcomed legal inward migration, protected refugees and ensured that each member state accepted its responsibilities. I supported common action to work to protect the European Union's external frontier, arguing that this should be achieved through the use of joint operations at weak points in the border, extensions of the immigration liaison officer network and greater use of Europol's expertise, rather than through the establishment of a new border police. I also supported the need to complete work on common asylum measures and co-operation with third countries in a spirit of "positive conditionality", involving the provision of assistance to support returns and develop migration infrastructures.

The Council also noted a presidency report on progress made in the fight against illegal immigration, agreed conclusions on measures to be established for the prevention of and the fight against illegal immigration and the trafficking of human beings by sea and agreed a plan on the management of external borders.

Proposal for a Council regulation establishing the criteria and mechanisms for determining the member state responsible for examining an asylum application lodged in one of the member states by a third-country national:

In discussing key aspects of the draft Dublin II Regulation, the majority of member states, including the United Kingdom, said that the existing Dublin Convention criteria should be taken as a starting point but that procedures should be improved and time limits shortened. Two member states with difficult external frontiers argued that they should not be penalised by virtue of their geographical position. Two other member states also opposed the proposed new criterion on tolerated illegal presence.

Proposal for a Council Decision on the implementation of specific measures for police and judicial co-operation to combat terrorism in accordance with Article 4 of Common Position 2001/931/CFSP:

The Council reached a general approach on the Council Decision. Portugal, France, Ireland, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom maintained parliamentary scrutiny reserves on the text.

Proposal for a Council Framework Decision laying down minimum provisions on the constituent elements of criminal acts and penalties in the field of drug trafficking:

The Council reached a general approach on the majority of the text. However, member states were divided by a proposal to permit the imposition of lower penalties for trafficking in small quantities of drugs. The presidency concluded that discussions on this item would continue under the Danish presidency.

Proposal for a Council Directive to improve access to justice in cross-border disputes by establishing minimum common rules relating to legal aid and other financial aspects of civil proceedings:

The Council agreed that the scope of the draft Legal Aid Directive should be limited to cross-border claims.

Proposal for a Council Regulation creating a European enforcement order for uncontested claims:

The Commission presented its proposal for a European enforcement order. This would abolish, in uncontested cases, the requirement for a court to examine the procedure by which a judgment was issued in another member state before recognising the validity of that judgment.

Civilian aspects of crisis management:

The presidency reported that member states had met the targets set by the Gothenburg European Council for the provision of officials and judges to international missions intended to strengthen the rule of law in third countries.

Any Other Business

The Commission presented its revised scoreboard on the implementation of the Tampere European Council conclusions.

Mixed Committee

The Mixed Committee with Norway and Iceland met at ministerial level in the margins of the Council. It noted the existence of two negotiating mandates for the association of Switzerland with the implementation of the Schengen acquis, the Dublin Convention and Eurodac acquis; of a general approach on the proposal for a Decision amending Article 40 of the Schengen Convention, subject to parliamentary scrutiny reserves from Germany, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom; of conclusions concerning the new requirements for the Schengen Information System (SIS) and a technical solution for the participation in the SIS by the United Kingdom and Ireland, reflecting the partial participation of the United Kingdom and Ireland in Schengen; and of a plan on the management of external borders.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the amount of paperwork for volunteers completing forms required by the Criminal Records Bureau. [61766]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 17 June 2002]: In order to ensure that Criminal Records Bureau (CRB) Disclosure Applications are processed accurately and in the interests of public safety 42 questions are asked of applicants. This is the case for all applicants, whether their positions are voluntary or paid.

There are no plans to reduce the amount of information requested for volunteers completing forms required by the CRB to process disclosure applications.

The CRB offers two application channels to request a disclosure, the telephone application line and the paper application form route. A third option is planned to be introduced later this year, when applicants will be able to apply via the CRB website. These measures have all been put in place to help keep the amount of paper work to a minimum.

Work Permits

Tony Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people who were awarded work permits to recruit them to (a) UK police forces, (b) UK schools and (c) the UK NHS from (i) India, (ii) South Africa, (iii) Bangladesh and (iv) Jamaica have returned to those countries in the last five years. [62634]

Beverley Hughes: Work Permits (UK), who administer the work permit arrangements, do not collect information to determine the number of work permit holders who return overseas.

The full number of work permit approvals issued for the Government, health and medical industry and education and cultural industry, for (i) India, (ii) South Africa, (iii) Bangladesh and (iv) Jamaica for the previous five years is listed in the table. It encompasses all of the sector, including the United Kingdom police forces, United Kingdom schools and the national health services (NHS), but also any other employers within these sectors. The way in which information is collated does not provide a separate breakdown for the requested specific employer groups.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will propose amendments to the criminal injuries compensation legislation in order to entitle victims of child abuse to benefit from the funds in those cases where the victim (a) lived with abuser and (b) the abuser was a close relative. [61922]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 18 June 2002]: We conducted a thorough review of the criminal injuries compensation scheme following a public consultation exercise launched in 1999, and made a number of significant changes to the scheme with effect from 1 April 2001. As part of that exercise we considered whether to change the rule which precludes payment of compensation for intra-family sexual abuse which occurred before 1 October 1979. However, we decided for a number of reasons that the rule should not be changed.

Hunting

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the cost has been of policing (a) demonstrations and other events arguing against legal restrictions on hunting and (b) hunting events (i) in 2001 and (ii) so far this year. [63438]

Mr. Denham: The information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidents of vandalism, criminal damage and other offences apparently carried out by those supporting hunting were reported to the police (a) in 2001 and (b) so far this year. [63437]

Mr. Denham: Figures for incidents reported to the police are not collected centrally. Details of those that the police then record as crimes are submitted to the Home Office by forces. Overall totals are broken down by type of offence, but information on the motivation of those who carry them out is not included.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent analysis he has made of a link between changes in crime and changes in the number of children (a) born to teenage women, (b) born outside marriage, (c) born into poverty and (d) in one-parent families; and if he will make a statement. [62409]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 19 June 2002]: There is no evidence of a link between changes in the level of crime and changes in the number of children born to teenage women, outside marriage or in one parent families. Research, however, has suggested that the following risk factors are cumulatively important:

poverty and poor housing;

poor parenting (including neglect, abuse, harsh and inconsistent discipline, lack of supervision and marital conflict); association with delinquent peers, siblings and partners;

low measures of intelligence, poor performance and persistent truancy;

high levels of impulsiveness and hyperactivity; and being brought up by a criminal parent or parents.[1]

The Home Office has also undertaken research to explore the influence of aggregate demographic and socio-economic factors on the level of crime. This demonstrated a link between changes in certain socio-economic variables, such as changes in GDP, the stock of economy-wide goods, and the number of young males aged 15–20; and property crime.[2]

Work is on-going to develop and improve the Home Office models and to examine the impact of a wider range of socio-economic factors on crime trends.

Dutch Somalians

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with his Dutch colleagues about Dutch Somalians who have left the Netherlands to settle in the UK. [63446]

Beverley Hughes: We are aware of increasing numbers of individuals of Somali origin arriving in the United Kingdom and claiming local authority support. It is in response to this issue that we have introduced an amendment to the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Bill. The purpose of this amendment is to clarify in law the duty that local authorities have to provide social assistance to these individuals, and will limit support available to this category of person when they have support available elsewhere.

The Dutch have recently expressed concern about this issue. My officials are in the process of liaising with other Government Departments and the Dutch Embassy in London about setting up channels of communication with the Dutch in response to this issue.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet the representatives from the Sikh Secretariat on 4 July to discuss the issues set out in the Sikh Agenda for the UK Government; and if he will make a statement. [63615]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 21 June 2002]: My noble Friend Lord Filkin is meeting a group of representatives from a number of Sikh organisations, likely to include one from the Sikh Secretariat, on 31 July to discuss issues relating to the British Sikh community.

Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Sikhs are serving as police officers in England and Wales, broken down by police authority. [63608]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 21 June 2002]: The information is not collected centrally.

Antisocial Behaviour Orders

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many antisocial behaviour orders have been issued in each police authority area. [63879]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 24 June 2002]: Official statistics on the number of antisocial behaviour orders (ASBOs) issued are based on quarterly returns received from magistrates' courts committees (MCCs). From 1 April 2001 MCC areas were aligned with all police force areas.

The latest available information up to December 2001 is given in the table.

Carrier Liability

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to consult the freight transport industry over the recent amendments to the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Bill imposing fines on lorry operators. [64305]

Beverley Hughes: Due to the tight legislative timescale, a formal consultation process in respect of amendments to the penalty regime has not been possible on this occasion. There was widespread consultation prior to the introduction in April 2000 of the regime, the provisions for which are contained in the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. There was further consultation when the regime was extended first to rail freight trains and then to freight shuttle trains. Industry representatives and other interested parties have been informed about the proposed changes to the legislation and have been sent copies of the draft code of practice for determining the level of penalty. We would welcome their comments during the remainder of the parliamentary process, and meetings are being arranged between officials and representatives.

Public Service Pensions

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his estimate is of (a) the aggregate liability for pensions and (b) the increase in liability for pensioners in the most recent year for which information is available for (i) the police, (ii) the Prison Service and (iii) the Immigration and Nationality Service. [63883]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 24 June 2002]: Police authorities are in the process of estimating, for the first time, their accrued liabilities for pensions in preparing their accounts for the year ended 31 March 2002. The Government Actuary's Department estimated as at 31 March 2001, that the liability in Great Britain for the police pension scheme was around £25 billion.

Those employed in the Prison Service and in the Immigration and Nationality Service participate in the principal civil service pension scheme, which is managed by the Cabinet Office. Cabinet Office civil superannuation resource accounts 2000–01 (HC554) give a capitalised value of the liabilities of the scheme as at 1 April 2000 of £58.6 billion. A breakdown of this amount between different parts of the civil service is not available.

There is no baseline against which to measure a change from one year to the next, so no figure for the increase in liabilities is available.

Criminal Records Checks

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how long the Criminal Records Office retains information sent to it in respect of those for whom criminal records checks in connection with work with children are sought, in the case of data subjects (a) with and (b) without criminal records. [63882]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 24 June 2002]: Information that is received by the Criminal Records Bureau from individuals who are applying for criminal records checks in connection with working with children is retained on the database for a period of six months, after which it is archived for a period of 10 years. There is no distinction made by the Criminal Records Bureau in the retention of such data between those individuals who have criminal records and those who do not.

The Criminal Records Bureau has and is continuing to work in close association with the information commissioner to ensure that it adheres to data protection legislation.

DNA Samples

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals have their DNA samples held by the police. [64244]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 June 2002]: DNA samples and the profiles derived from them are held on behalf of the police by the national DNA database custodian at the Forensic Science Service. As of 19 June 2002, the national DNA database holds 1,662,827 samples taken from individuals in England and Wales.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether an individual who has been required to provide a DNA sample by the police has the right to have that sample destroyed in the event of an acquittal for the charge which prompted the sample being taken. [64242]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 June 2002]: An individual does not have the right for their DNA sample to be destroyed in the event of an acquittal. Under section 82 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, amending section 64 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, a chief constable may decide to retain DNA samples in all cases, including following acquittal or a decision to drop a prosecution, except where the sample was taken as part of a mass screening process and the individual does not consent to the retention of the sample. Samples can only be used for purposes related to the prevention or detection of crime, the investigation of an offence or the conduct of a prosecution.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is central access to DNA samples held by different police forces. [64243]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 June 2002]: DNA samples are retained in England and Wales by the laboratories authorised to analyse them. They are the Forensic Science Service, the Laboratory of the Government Chemist and Cellmark. The laboratories submit the DNA profiles from these samples to the Forensic Science Service which acts as custodian of the national DNA database.

As the custodian, the Forensic Science Service inputs, updates and manages the information on the national DNA database and searches it for intelligence data at the request of the police.

Asylum Seekers

Tony Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Clause 25 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Bill will ensure that adequate provision is made for asylum seekers with special medical needs. [57995]

Beverley Hughes: Asylum seekers have access to national health service care in the same way as people who are settled here. Clause 26 (previously clause 25) of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Bill contains a power to enable the Secretary of State to provide accommodation centre residents with facilities relating to health. Using this power, we intend to provide on-site primary health care to asylum seekers in accommodation centres.

Asylum seekers with special health needs will only be housed in accommodation centres if the on-site health care provider is equipped to deal with their needs or if it is possible make other arrangements that would still enable them to live at the centre. Each case will be considered on its merits.

Police

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what discretion is given to individual police services in recruiting police officers that do not match the prescribed eyesight criteria set by his Department; [62655]

(2) what national standards are set by his Department for (a) unaided and (b) aided vision for new recruits to the police service. [62656]

Mr. Denham: The Home Office provides guidance to forces on eyesight standards. The present guidance for eyesight is that candidates' unaided vision must be 6–24 or better in either eye and aided vision must be 6–12 or better in either eye and 6–6 binocularly.

All forces are expected to follow the guidance, but responsibility for the appointment of constables rests with the Chief Officer of each force.

A Home Office project is under way to establish national recruitment standards (NRS) for the police service. It is reviewing all current entry requirements, to ensure they are job related, evidence based and non discriminatory. The eyesight guidelines are currently under review as part of the NRS project.

When the new standards are in place, forces will be required to follow them.

Paddy Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers there were in Nottinghamshire on 31 March of each year since 1981; and how many there are expected to be on 31 March 2003. [64246]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 June 2002]: The table sets out police numbers for each year since 1981. I am told by the Chief Constable of Nottinghamshire (Mr. Stephen Green QPM) the force has a target strength of 2,434 officers for 31 March 2002.

Police force performance does not depend solely upon the number of officers available. The proposals in the White Paper "Policing a New Century: A blueprint for reform" set out a radical and ambitious programme of reform, with the overall aim of reducing crime and the fear of crime and to tackle anti-social behaviour. The test of success will be whether the measures being put in place will make a real difference to the quality of life of individuals and communities up and down the country.

The public have a right to expect the same high standards of service wherever they live and the Government propose to put a framework in place to ensure that all police forces come up to the standard of the best.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what mechanism exists to prevent duplication of activity between (a) HMIC, (b) the Police Standards Unit, (c) the Audit Commission and (d) Home Office-based teams in respect of the police. [64241]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 June 2002]: Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC), the Police Standards Unit, the Audit Commission and the Home Office have separate but complementary roles which together seek to ensure that the police service in England and Wales is efficient and effective.

A steering group chaired by myself, due to my responsibility for policing, oversees implementation of the police reform programme and ensures a cohesive and prioritised approach to police activity. Senior Home Office officials, Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary and the Police Standards Director attend these meetings.

There are close working relationships between HMIC and the Police Standards Unit. Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary and the Police Standards Director meet regularly. Their respective roles are clearly defined. HMIC has an independent inspection and monitoring role as distinct from the police standards unit's policy implementation and support role.

There are well developed mechanisms for co-ordination of HMIC and the audit commission's work which in turn ensure that both those organisations' work is properly integrated with that of the police standards unit. There are regular meetings between Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary and the Audit Commission Controller. There are formal agreements in place where duplication is possible, for example on the integration of audit and inspection of best value performance plans.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what targets have been set within the police for the recruitment and retention of officers from ethnic minorities; and what the latest outturns are in respect of these targets. [63621]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 24 June 2002]: The latest recruitment figures available are as at 30 September 2001. The following table shows, by police force, the minority ethnic (ME) officer strength target for 2009, ME officer strength and percentage as at 30 September 2001.

Police force	2009 target (percentage)	Number of ME officers September 2001	Percentage of ME officers September 2001

Note: Figures have been set to 1 per cent. for areas below 1 per cent.

The targets for retention are that the percentage of minority ethnic officers leaving the service through resignation or dismissal each year should equal the percentage of white officers leaving each year under similar circumstances within three years in each of the following bands:

six months to under two years service

two years to under five years service

five years to under 10 years service with demonstrable, significant progress made each year to reduce the overall figure.

Figures for March 2000 act as baseline and forces' progress against targets is due to be monitored at 31 March 2003.

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers there were in England and Wales on (a) 9 September 1999 and (b) 31 May 2002. [64090]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 24 June 2002]: Information for the specified dates has not been collected centrally. However, on 30 September 1999 there were 125,394 officers and on 31 January 2002 (the latest date for which figures are available) there were 128,748 officers in England and Wales. This was a record number.

The increase in police strength reflects the impact of the crime fighting fund (CFF), which is enabling forces in England and Wales to recruit 9,000 officers over and above previous recruitment plans in the three years to March 2003.

Prisons

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the fire insurance problems facing new privately funded prisons. [59446]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 24 May 2002]: The new privately managed prisons to be built at Ashford, Middlesex and at Peterborough are facing problems in securing insurance cover for fire. These problems are being addressed both by the consortium that is to build and operate the prisons and by the Prison Service and the Home Office.

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with which companies the Prison Service have contracts for the transport of prisoners to court; if he will place the terms of their contracts in the Library; what assessment he has made of the effect of transport delays on the operation of courts and the associated costs to public funds; how many times penalty clauses have been invoked against each company, with the sums involved in each case; and if he will make a statement. [62599]

Hilary Benn: The Prison Service has entered into eight contracts with private sector companies for the movement of prisoners from prisons and police stations to court. These are set out in the table.

Contract area	Company
South West England and South Wales	Reliance Custodial Services
South and South East England	Premier Prison Services
London	Securicor Custodial Services
East Anglia	Group 4 Court Services
East Midlands	Group 4 Court Services
West Midlands and Mid Wales	Premier Prison Services
Greater Manchester, Merseyside and North Wales	Group 4 Court Services
Northern England	Group 4 Court Services

Contract documentation, excluding those parts which contain price sensitive information, are available in the Library.

Contractors, prisons and the police are all aware of the effect of late deliveries to court and the potential cost to public funds. Each contract is monitored by a team of Prison Service staff against a series of performance measures. These cover a range of issues including delivery to court. Failures against the performance measures result in the application of penalty points and if these exceed a prescribed total in any single year they result in the application of a financial remedy.

Financial remedies have been applied on six occasions since 1999 and have affected all contractors. The total sum recovered or withheld is approximately £621,000. This is made up as follows.

Company	Occasions	Total value (£)
Group 4 Court Services	1	60,000
Premier Prison Services	1	36,000
Securicor Custodial Services	2	500,000
Reliance Custodial Services	2	25,000

The £500,000 in financial remedies imposed upon Securicor related to performance shortfalls during the years 1999–2000 and 2000–01, when shortages of staff contributed to a number of failures to meet the requirements of the contract, including the timely delivery of prisoners to court. The situation was the subject of discussion between Home Office Ministers and members of Securicor's senior management, as a result of which an improvement plan was produced by the company. This has now been implemented and there are indications that it is beginning to achieve positive results.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish his response to the joint thematic report "Through the Prison Gate" published by the Chief Inspector of Prisons and the Chief Inspector of Probation. [66650]

Hilary Benn: "Through the Prison Gate" was the first joint thematic report by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons and Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Probation on the theme of resettlement. The two chief inspectors have provided an authoritative and thoughtful analysis of what the prison and probation services are doing together to reintegrate offenders back into the community and so reduce re-offending, and of what more both services need to do. I am very grateful to them for this analysis, much of which is reinforced in the report "Reducing re-offending by Ex-Prisoners" published today by the Social Exclusion Unit (SEU).

Both of these reports recognise the importance of identifying the factors which need to be addressed for individual offenders if the risks of them re-offending are to be reduced. They also recognise the importance of developing an integrated approach to the management of offenders throughout their sentence.

The chief inspectors' report makes recommendations on the need for:

a national resettlement strategy;

the position of short-term prisoners to be taken into account when reviewing the sentencing framework;

the Prison and Probation Services to develop the what works strategy and to achieve consistency and continuity in preventing re-offending and reintegrating offenders into the community;

a case management approach, and for the Prison and Probation Services to review the respective roles of their staff at different stages of a prison sentence;

the Prison Service to develop a strategy for prisoners to be located closer to home;

the Prison and Probation Services to develop a co-ordinated partnership plan as part of their what works resettlement strategy;

both services to develop a joint strategy for drug and alcohol misuse;

both services to provide guidance on the role of home detention curfew (HDC); and both services to ensure that a national public protection policy is developed for the assessment and management of risk in all cases.

Many of these issues are also picked up in the SEU report. The Government will now be producing an action plan setting out our proposals for taking forward the recommendations. In drawing up that action plan we will also take account of the recommendations made by the chief inspectors.

As the chief inspectors acknowledge, the Prison and Probation Services have made progress in developing and co-ordinating their resettlement policies under the what works approach. However, there is a need for greater overall strategic direction including greater sharing of good practice and performance targets.

We have already taken steps to provide greater strategic direction by making arrangements for the establishment of the Correctional Services Board, which will bring together the heads of the Prison and Probation Services and the chair of the Youth Justice Board. Outside experience and skills will be provided by non-executive members. Early priorities for the board will include the development of a strategic plan for the correctional services, with a particular focus, as the report recommends, on improving provision for those sentenced to less than 12 months, and, in particular, 18 to 20 year old offenders.

In taking forward both the chief inspectors' and the SEU reports we will also be developing a national resettlement strategy. Details will be set out in the action plan which will now be developed.

That action plan will also include proposals for developing and piloting a case management approach, as recommended by the chief inspectors, building upon the pilot schemes which the Prison and Probation Services are already running.

"Through the Prison Gate" draws attention to the benefits of keeping prisoners closer to their homes in the months before release and to the benefits of home detention curfew in helping prisoners prepare for release. We believe that HDC can play an important part in helping offenders to settle back into the community in a controlled way.

We also recognise the advantages for resettlement of prisoners being able to serve their sentences closer to home. Although the increasing prison population makes it difficult to achieve this we will continue to explore both nationally and regionally what more can be done to minimise the number of prisoners held outside their home area.

The importance of tackling drug and alcohol problems is highlighted in both "Through the Prison Gate" and the SEU report. A good deal of investment has been made by both services in this area, but there is clearly more to be done, particularly in ensuring continuity of care and of provision in the community. We will be addressing this issue further as we take forward the planning and implementation of our resettlement strategy.

"Through the Prison Gate" also highlights the importance for a national public protection policy of the assessment and management of risk in all cases. The effective management of dangerous offenders is a priority for both the Prison and Probation Services. Both services have a detailed programme of work in support of their public protection objectives, and are represented on the Home Office Dangerous Offenders Advisory Group. The establishment of multi agency public protection panels has placed a statutory duty on police and probation services to make joint arrangements for the assessment and management of sexual, violent and other offenders who may cause serious harm. These panels work closely with the prison service and other agencies in managing the risk presented by such offenders. In addition the National Probation Service is working with the Police Information Technology Organisation on the development of a joint police/probation database, which will cover all offenders falling under the public protection duty placed on the police and the National Probation Service by the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000.

Both services are also working together with the Parole Board to develop revised guidance on the setting of licence conditions to ensure a more consistent approach and are piloting the use of electronic monitoring as a licence condition, focusing in particular on dangerous offenders.

A detailed commentary on all the recommendations contained in the inspectorates' report describing work currently in hand by the Prison Service and the National Probation Service has been placed in the Library.

"Through the Prison Gate" together with the SEU report, has set out a challenging set of tasks and the new Correctional Services Board. We will in due course be publishing an action plan setting out our detailed proposals in response to the SEU report, and the recommendations of the chief inspectors.

Police Authorities

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many households there are in each police authority. [64539]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nigel Evans, dated 1 July 2002:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the number of households in each police authority area. (64539)

Children in Care

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children in care have been (a) homeless, (b) in bed-and-breakfast accommodation and (c) in temporary accommodation in each of the last five years. [64525]

Mr. McNulty: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

CABINET OFFICE

Mr. Collins: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when the Cabinet Office website will be amended to reflect the recent organisational changes. [63580]

Mr. Alexander: The Cabinet Office website has been amended to reflect ministerial changes.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 2 July 2002

PRIME MINISTER

Elections

Richard Burden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the responsibilities of Ministers and Government Departments for electoral systems and electoral arrangements relating to elections for (a) councils, (b) the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly, (c) the European Parliament, (d) the London Assembly and future English regional assemblies and (e) the House of Commons, with particular reference to consideration of proposals for review and reform. [62958]

The Prime Minister: Ministerial responsibility for policy, including for reform and modernisation, on election matters is for:

the Lord Chancellor for House of Commons and European Parliament elections in England and Wales, and for co-ordination on UK-wide electoral matters;

the Deputy Prime Minister for elections to English, and to the extent issues are not devolved Welsh, councils, the Greater London Authority, and any future English regional assembly;

the Secretary of State for Scotland for all elections in Scotland, other than those for councils, which is a devolved matter;

the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for all elections in Northern Ireland;

the Secretary of State for Wales for Welsh Assembly elections.

All these responsibilities are exercised in consultation with the Electoral Commission, which is accountable through the Speaker's Committee to the House of Commons.

Intelligence Services

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister for what reason the Ministerial Committee on the Intelligence Services has not been asked to endorse the UK's Requirements and Priorities for Secret Intelligence. [65152]

The Prime Minister: The UK's requirements for secret intelligence are submitted to the Ministerial Committee on the Intelligence Services each year for endorsement.

Interception of Communications Commissioner

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on paragraph 30 of the Intelligence and Security Committee annual report 2001–02 with specific reference to the resources available to the Interception of Communications Commissioner. [65151]

The Prime Minister: As stated in the Government Response to the Intelligence and Security Committee's annual report for 2001–02, officials are discussing with the Commissioner what extra resources would be required to deal with the anticipated increase in work. The Government will make available to the Commissioner an appropriate level of resources to enable him to carry out his responsibilities.

National Energy Research Centre

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals he has for a national energy research centre. [65093]

The Prime Minister: The Department for Trade and Industry has lead responsibility on this issue.

The establishment of a national energy research centre was a key recommendation of the review of Government support for energy research led by the Chief Scientific Adviser last autumn. Like all the other recommendations of that review, it was incorporated into the report of the Performance and Innovation Unit's wider review of energy policy published on 14 February. The Government intend to set out their response to that report in a White Paper around the turn of the year.

In the meantime, the Research Councils are developing detailed proposals for an energy research centre in consultation with the Chief Scientific Adviser and other interested parties. These would form part of a broader proposal for sustainable energy research.

TRANSPORT

Rail Services (West Cornwall)

10. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent assessment he has made of the reliability of rail services to west Cornwall. [63721]

Mr. Spellar: The Strategic Rail Authority produces performance figures for each of the train operating companies in its publication 'On Track'. The latest version was published on 6 June and has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Rail and LRT Services

11. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to provide (a) rail and (b) LRT services to towns that have neither. [63723]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority's Strategic Plan sets out priorities for development of the national rail network. In addition to national strategic priorities it includes increased funding for the Rail Passenger Partnership scheme, which is available to support local schemes. It is for local authorities to promote, through the Local Transport Plan process, the public transport modes best suited to their area.

Bus Travel (Worcester)

12. Mr. Michael Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to encourage the greater use of bus travel within Worcester. [63724]

Mr. Spellar: The Secretary of State provides funding to Worcestershire County Council to implement its Local Transport Plan. The first annual progress report on the Local Transport Plan includes a draft bus strategy which provides more detail on how the Council will be developing their bus services. Recent initiatives which have been implemented in Worcester include:

Park and Ride—the first of three proposed sites opened in May 2001,

Bus access scheme—Angel Street, and Bus quality partnership—Worcester to Eckington.

In addition the Council has received bursaries which have allowed them to appoint school and workplace travel co-ordinators. These co-ordinators are dedicated to encouraging sustainable transport, including the use of buses, across the county.

Fuel Duty Rebate

13. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he has made in his review of fuel duty rebate for providers of bus passenger services. [63725]

Mr. Spellar: Work is under way on the review of bus subsidies, including fuel duty rebate, announced in the April Budget. We will take this forward over the coming months. It will build on ongoing work by the Commission for Integrated Transport, due to conclude in the autumn, and other related studies. It will also invite views from other interested bodies.

30. Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the likely impact of the fuel duty rebate introduced in May for community transport services. [63744]

Mr. Jamieson: Over 320 community transport organisations have already applied for eligibility to receive fuel duty rebate. Eligible organisations will be making their first claims for payment this autumn. This funding will enable the improvement and expansion of services which have an important role in improving accessibility and combating social exclusion.

Speed Controls

14. John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what alternatives to speed cushions his Department is investigating. [63726]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department has an extensive programme of road safety research covering a wide range of topics including development and evaluation of a variety of road humps and traffic calming works designed to reduce road accidents and encourage improved driving styles. Full details of current research and summaries of results of completed research are provided in a Road Safety Research Compendium, which is available on the Department's website and in the Library of the House.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to change the policy in relation to the use of speed limit repeater signs; and if he will make a statement. [65781]

Mr. Jamieson: Local authorities are required to sign all speed limits where the speed limit has been created by way of a speed limit order. The exemptions are where the road is a restricted road (30mph indicated by a system of street lighting) where repeater signs are strictly prohibited, or on roads where the national speed limit applies.

However, we are looking at signing as part of the overall package on developing improved speed management. The issue of speed limit repeater signs will form part of our considerations.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what guidance he gives on the visibility of speed cameras. [65780]

Mr. Jamieson: Visibility rules for those areas participating in the safety camera netting off scheme were announced on 3 December 2001. These state that fixed site camera housings should be clearly signed and made visible by being painted or marked in yellow. Mobile enforcement units should also be clearly marked and visible to drivers. Areas currently outside the netting off scheme would need to comply with all the visibility requirements as a condition of joining.

Railways (Trespass and Vandalism)

15. Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on incidences of trespass and vandalism on the railways. [63729]

Mr. Jamieson: Trespass and vandalism is a serious problem for the railways.

It is very disappointing that over half of all train incidents are due to vandalism. The Government are pleased that all sections of the rail industry recently came together in the National Route Crime Group to examine and promote ways of tackling trespass and vandalism on the railways.

School Run (Congestion)

16. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his assessment is of the impact on congestion of children being driven to school. [63730]

Mr. Jamieson: 16 per cent. of cars on urban roads at 8.50 am in term time in 1998–2000 were taking children to school. This is a reduction from 20 per cent. in 1995–97. We have asked local authorities to include strategies for further reductions in their local transport plans and have increased funding for associated measures.

Gourock Station (Redevelopment)

17. David Cairns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has had with Railtrack concerning the redevelopment of the transport interchange at Gourock station. [63731]

Mr. Jamieson: None. I understand that the Scottish Executive is working with the promoting authorities for the scheme to try to find the way forward. Signal design and engineering resources remain at a premium within the rail industry although Railtrack and the Strategic Rail Authority are taking steps to address the shortage.

Airport Capacity

18. Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the ability of current airport capacity to meet demand for air travel over the next 10 years. [63732]

Mr. Spellar: We are currently finalising a series of regional consultation documents on airports and air services, between them covering the whole of the UK, which we intend to publish shortly. These consultation documents include an assessment of current airport capacity to meet demand for air travel up to 2030, and identify the capacity enhancements which might be required over that period under a range of policy scenarios.

Train Punctuality

19. Mr. Baron: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the trends in train punctuality over the last five years. [63733]

Mr. Spellar: Between 1997 and 2000 the rolling annual average Public Performance Measure (PPM), which measures punctuality and reliability, slowly declined from about 90 per cent. to 86 per cent. as the number of train kilometres ran (passengers and freight) increased by some 20 per cent. Punctuality and reliability fell sharply after Hatfield due, in large part, to the temporary speed restrictions imposed to deal with gauge corner cracking and other rail defects. The rolling annual average PPM fell to 75 per cent. though it is now rising. The Strategic Rail Authority is working with the rail industry to achieve substantial, lasting improvements in performance.

Train Services (London)

20. Roger Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve the reliability of train services in London. [63734]

Mr. Jamieson: It is a primary objective for the Strategic Rail Authority to work with the rail industry to achieve substantial lasting improvements in performance. £400 million has been allocated to a new Rail Performance Fund set up to co-invest with rail companies in short-term schemes to improve reliability for passengers.

Rail Stops (Leeds)

21. Colin Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to encourage the opening of new suburban rail stops in the Leeds area. [63735]

Mr. Spellar: The Rail Passenger Partnership scheme administered by the Strategic Rail Authority helps fund new or enhanced rail services or facilities, including stations.

I understand that the West Yorkshire Passenger Transport Executive (PTE) has commissioned a study into five potential new stations as part of the proposed new Northern franchise.

High Speed Rail Links

22. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Strategic Rail Authority to discuss the development of high speed rail links. [63736]

Mr. Spellar: The Strategic Rail Authority's study into the need for and viability of a high speed line running between London and the North of England and Scotland is due to be completed later this year. The Chairman of the Authority will report the findings to Ministers at that time.

Freight (Railways)

23. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made in transferring freight traffic to railways in the past five years. [63737]

Mr. Jamieson: Our policy is to help establish an integrated, sustainable freight distribution system to support economic growth and bring social and environmental benefits. In the past five years, the amount of rail freight moved has grown by 30 per cent., including 9 per cent. in the past year.

Transatlantic Air Services

24. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on transatlantic air services. [63738]

Mr. Spellar: The UK Government is keen to liberalise the UK-US Air Services Agreement as we would like consumers to benefit from increased competition and airlines to benefit from improved access to the world's largest market. But that competition has to be on fair terms. We are currently reviewing a range of options that are open to us.

Road User Charging

25. Richard Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received regarding road user charging. [63739]

Mr. Jamieson: We have received various representations, reflecting various points of view.

A303 (Safety)

26. Mr. Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on safety improvements to the A303. [63740]

Mr. Jamieson: A number of safety improvement schemes have recently been undertaken on the A303. The Highways Agency continues to monitor the safety record of this and other trunk roads and, if further improvements are needed, they will be added to the Agency's programme.

Railways (Private Finance)

27. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the railways' ability to raise private finance. [63741]

Mr. Spellar: The 10-Year Plan for Transport and the SRA Strategic Plan have projected a total amount of private sector investment in rail of around £34 billion over the 10 years to March 2011. This investment will be supported and levered in by £33.5 billion of public sector funding for rail.

We remain confident that this level of private investment will be delivered, indeed over £7 billion has already been committed.

Airports (Consultation)

28. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to consult on the future of airports in Great Britain. [63742]

Mr. Spellar: We are currently finalising a series of regional consultation documents on airports and air services between them covering the whole of the UK, which we intend to publish shortly; these documents will seek views on the future development of airports and air services in each region over the next 30 years.

Light Railway and Tram Schemes

29. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to expand light railway and tram schemes. [63743]

Mr. Jamieson: Our 10-Year Plan reflects our commitment to light rail in major cities. However, whether light rail offers the most appropriate and cost-effective response to local transport needs is a matter, in the first instance, for the local authorities concerned, to consider while formulating and reviewing their Local Transport Plans. Thereafter, any light rail scheme or other major transport project would need to undergo rigorous appraisal, and examination under any relevant statutory procedures, before funding approval could be considered.

Buses (Pupil Overcrowding)

31. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about changing the law on pupil overcrowding on scheduled bus services. [63745]

Mr. Spellar: We have received no recent representations, other than the parliamentary questions tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth at the end of last year, which dealt with overcrowding on a bus route in Monmouth and related matters.

Fire Safety

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (a) statutory duty and (b) guidelines have been given to fire authorities on giving fire safety advice to the public. [60439]

Mr. Raynsford: I have been asked to reply.

Fire authorities have a statutory duty under The Fire Services Act 1947 1(1)(f) to secure efficient arrangements for the giving, when requested, of advice in respect of buildings and other property in the area of the fire authority as to fire prevention, restricting the spread of fires, and means of escape in case of fire.

In addition to this, we intend to introduce a duty on fire authorities to secure efficient arrangements for providing advice, assistance and encouragement in respect of the steps to be taken to prevent fires in their area and to prevent the death of, or injury to, any person being caused by such a fire. This will form part of a Regulatory Reform Order, which will be out for consultation shortly.

The National Community Fire Safety Centre was established in 1998 to provide a resource for brigades in community fire safety work, whose toolbox gives guidance on advising the public on fire safety issues as well as examples of best practice.

Illegal Fuel

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action the Government are taking to tackle fuel fraud; and how much has been allocated to this task in the last three years. [62944]

John Healey: I have been asked to reply.

Following consultation in the November 2001 pre-Budget report, the Chancellor announced in the Budget a comprehensive strategy to tackle the rising problem of oils fraud including the release of additional resources in 2002–03 to enable the effective enforcement of these new controls, involving the deployment of more staff and investment in new technology. Details of this are contained in the Budget 2002 Press Notice, HMG 2, published on 17 April.

Customs' estimate of officers wholly dedicated to the oils sector over the last three complete financial years is:

	Dedicated oils officers
1999–2000	172
2000–01	253
2001–02	285

These officers assure and assist compliant traders and also tackle those who seek to evade revenue through fraudulent activities.

In addition, multi-functional Customs officers undertake a range of activities in their areas of responsibility including work in the oils sector. It is not possible to separate the time spent by these officers on oils work alone.

Motoring Costs

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research his Department has carried out as to the cost of running a private motor car within the Greater London area. [65053]

Mr. Jamieson: The average expenditure on motoring per car per week for people living in Greater London, averaged over the period 1998–99 to 2000–01, was £54.30.

Bus Priority Schemes

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what bus priority schemes have been introduced since 1997, giving (a) the date of introduction of the scheme and (b) the body introducing and responsible for the scheme, distinguishing between (i) guided bus systems, (ii) infrastructure improvements and (iii) other schemes. [64967]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Since 1997 we have approved or provisionally approved the following bus-based major local transport schemes in England outside London. The table lists the schemes, their type, the local authority and the year of approval.

Authority	Scheme	Type
1998
West Yorkshire PTA	East Leeds Quality Bus Project	Guided
1999
Bradford	A641 Manchester Road Quality Bus Project	Guided
West Midlands PTA	Town Centre Strategy	Infrastructure

2000
Bradford	South Bradford Integrated Transport Improvements	Infrastructure
Bradford	City Centre Integrated Transport Scheme	Infrastructure
Cheshire	Chester-Deeside Transport Scheme	Guided
Derby	Connecting Derby	Infrastructure
Doncaster	A638 Great North Road Quality Bus Corridor	Infrastructure
Greater Manchester PTA	Urban Traffic Management Scheme	Other
Newcastle	Quayside Public Transport Project	Infrastructure
Warwickshire	Nuneaton Development Project	Infrastructure
Plymouth	Northern Corridor Scheme	Infrastructure
Wiltshire	Salisbury Integrated Transport Measures	Infrastructure
Southend	A13 Transport Corridor	Infrastructure
Tyne and Wear PTA	Centrelink	Infrastructure
Tyne and Wear PTA	Stephensons Corridor Joblink	Infrastructure
Walsall	Integrated Transport Strategy	Infrastructure
Warrington	Urban Traffic Management Scheme	Other
West Midlands PTA	Hagley Road Bus Showcase	Infrastructure
West Midlands PTA	Outer Circle Bus Showcase	Infrastructure
West Sussex	Fastway	Guided
Wolverhampton	Centre Access Scheme	Infrastructure
2001
Barnsley	Barnsley Interchange	Infrastructure
Durham	Belmont Interchange	Infrastructure
Greater Manchester PTA	Northern Orbital Quality Bus Corridor	Infrastructure
Kent	Fastrack	Guided
Leeds	A65 Quality Bus Project	Guided
Surrey	School Bus Initiative	Other
Tyne and Wear PTA	Four Lane Ends Interchange	Infrastructure
West Midlands PTA	Masshouse Circus	Infrastructure
2002
Greater Manchester PTA	South East Manchester Quality Bus Corridor	Infrastructure

Allocation of road space is a matter for the local highway authority. In addition to the major schemes, local authorities outside London indicate that they proposed to implement over 100 smaller scale bus priority schemes in both the last and present financial years.

In London, since 3 July 2000 the implementation of bus priority measures has been the responsibility of the London local authorities and Transport for London (which reports to the Mayor). They are taking forward the London Bus Initiative, which is a strategic initiative to improve the service on London's key bus routes and includes priority measures. This £60 million initiative is being funded by the Government, including £50 million from the Capital Modernisation Fund.

Before 3 July 2000, bus priority measures in London were taken forward by the London local authorities through the London Bus Priority Network initiative.

Details about schemes in London and specific smaller schemes outside, including their timetable for introduction and detailed cost break-down, are not kept centrally.

Network Rail

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who is selecting the initial non-executive board members of Network Rail; and who has selected the member organisations of Network Rail. [66053]

Mr. Jamieson: The appointments of directors and members are for Network Rail to determine.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reason the bridging loan to Network Rail is shown on the balance sheet of the Strategic Rail Authority; what assets the Strategic Rail Authority has to back the loan; what consultations took place with the European Commission about whether this loan should be included in Government accounts; and to whom the loss is charged if there is default on the loan. [65486]

Mr. Jamieson: The Comptroller and Auditor General, in his capacity as statutory auditor of the Strategic Rail Authority (SRA), has concluded that Network Rail should be accounted for as a subsidiary of the SRA. At the same time, the Office for National Statistics has confirmed that Network Rail—once its board has been confirmed by its members—would not be classified as a public sector organisation. The ONS classification is based upon the European System of Accounts 1995.

The contingent credit facility has been notified as a potential state aid to the European Commission, and it set out in the statutory contingent liability minute laid before Parliament on 27 June. As a contingent liability, the credit facility would only score as public expenditure in the extremely unlikely event of it being drawn.

The assets of the SRA were outlined in its 2000–01 annual report and will be updated in its 2001–02 annual report to be published shortly.

Road Accidents

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many deaths and serious injuries there were in road accidents in 2001; and if he will make a statement. [66466]

Mr. Jamieson: Provisional figures, published in June, show that there were 3,443 people killed and 37,094 seriously injured on the public roads in Great Britain in 2001.

This year, despite our firm commitment to improving road safety, it is sad to see an increase in the number of road deaths when both serious and slight injuries have continued to fall. We will be looking to see if there are identifiable reasons for this year's increase in the number of road deaths.

Delay Indicator Maps

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place copies of the Highways Agency delay indicator maps in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [66213]

Mr. Jamieson: The Highways Agency's annual report for 2000–01 contains on page 39 the latest version of a map depicting stress levels on the trunk road network. The annual report was published on 31 January 2002 and copies were placed in the Libraries of the House.

Road Schemes

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what road schemes will be proposed in the next round of local transport plan annual progress reports; and if he will make a statement; [66301]

(2) when the next set of local transport plan annual progress reports will be published; and if he will make a statement. [66300]

Mr. Jamieson: Our guidance to authorities makes clear that local transport plan annual progress reports for 2001–02 should be made available to the public and easily obtainable at a reasonable cost. The reports are required to be submitted to my Department by English local authorities outside London by 31 July 2002 as are any proposals for new major local transport schemes. When received, both the reports and any bids for new major schemes will be considered as part of the determination of local transport capital settlement for 2003–04.

Ladbroke Grove Rail Inquiry

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the next progress report on the Ladbroke Grove rail inquiry part I will be published; and if he will make a statement. [66307]

Mr. Jamieson: On 29 April 2002, the Health and Safety Commission (HSC) stated that in future it will report progress on all 295 public inquiry recommendations in a single report under eight broad headings. This will include the Southall inquiry, so far as it is still relevant, the joint inquiry into Train Protection Systems, and the two Ladbroke Grove inquiries. The HSC plan to publish this report in November 2002.

The HSC and the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) will continue to track action on each recommendation to ensure that none are overlooked. The HSC believes that presenting the information in this format will help everyone involved to gain a better appreciation of the overall safety benefits being delivered as well as sharpening focus on the key issues.

Bus Services

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (a) guidance has been given to local authorities and (b) legislation is in place covering (i) uncompetitive practices, (ii) improving integration and timetabling, (iii) regulation and de-regulation and (iv) quality partnerships for local bus services; and if he will make a statement. [66004]

Mr. Jamieson: My Department's guidance to local authorities on Local Transport Plans covers many of these matters. It emphasises the need for bus policies and provision to be integrated with other transport policies and encourages through-ticketing, better connections and co-ordination of services. Good practice guidance notes on quality bus partnerships and on public transport interchange have been produced on our behalf by consultants. The Office of Fair Trading will shortly be issuing guidance on the ticketing schemes block exemption and the application of the competition test contained in the Transport Act 2000, for the benefit of both local government and bus operators.

The relevant legislation is Part II of the Transport Act 2000, chapter I of Part I of the Competition Act 1998 and the Competition Act 1998 (Public Transport Ticketing Schemes Block Exemption) Order 2001 (SI 2001 No. 319). Other legislation on the regulation of buses is in the Public Passenger Vehicles Act 1981 and the Transport Act 1985.

Secure Stations Scheme

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the stations which are not accredited under the secure stations scheme, indicating the total number of passengers using those stations used by more than 100,000 passengers each year; and if he will make a statement. [66003]

Mr. Jamieson: The secure stations scheme is voluntary.

Currently 143 stations are accredited under the scheme. Approximately one third of annual national rail passenger journeys involve these stations. Some TOCs are committed to seeking accreditation for all their stations.

Quiet Lanes

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, column 775W, on quiet lanes, what the total length of roads designated as quiet lanes is for each local authority; and what proportion of these roads is within each road classification. [66065]

Mr. Jamieson: The information required to answer the question is not recorded centrally.

London Underground

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reason preferred bidder status was conceded to contractors for the London Underground PPP before closing major parts of the deal; and if he will assess the costs and benefits of reducing competition before final agreements were reached. [65480]

Mr. Jamieson: The negotiation of the PPP contracts is a matter for London Underground. However, I understand that, in line with guidance from the Office of Government Commerce, preferred bidder decisions were taken at the time they were because it was judged that the advantages to be gained from maintaining competitive tension were outweighed by the disadvantages of higher procurement costs and an increased risk of bids being withdrawn.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether the seven-and-a-half-year review of the 30-year PPP contract for the London Underground is an upwards only review; and what extra costs may fall on his Department for cost overruns; [65482]

(2) what price protection London Underground Ltd has for the 22.5 years for which pricing is not yet established under the PPP; and what the cost is of contract termination provisions of periodic review. [65587]

Mr. Jamieson: In line with the provisions of the GLA Act 1999, the Secretary of State for Transport intends to appoint an independent arbiter. At periodic reviews, the arbiter has the power to set prices at a level appropriate for an economic and efficient infrastructure company. Prices set by the arbiter at these reviews could be either higher or lower than those currently expected. At this stage, it is not possible to say either by how much or in which direction they might vary.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much will be invested in the tube under the London Underground PPP; how much of this comes from the private sector; and how much of the private sector contribution the Government have guaranteed to pay back. [65484]

Mr. Jamieson: Under our plans for modernising the London Underground, private sector infrastructure companies will carry out an investment and maintenance programme that is expected to amount to at least £16 billion over the first 15 years of the contracts. This will be funded through a combination of private finance and payments from London Underground. The payments London Underground make will vary in line with the level of performance the infrastructure companies deliver. In total, we expect some £6.2 billion in private finance to be raised in the first 15 years.

The Government will not guarantee any private sector finance. However, the Secretary of State does intend to issue a letter of comfort in relation to the London Underground PPPs. This is intended to clarify his role in relation to the Greater London Authority and Transport for London, including his intentions towards providing funding for London Underground. This letter of comfort was reported to Parliament using the Minute procedure on 20 March 2002.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the rate of return the private consortia will earn on the London Underground PPP; and what assessment he has made of the fees earned by the financial and legal consultants engaged on developing the PPP. [65485]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers given to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) on 14 May 2002, Official Report, columns 522–23W.

Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which business men advised the Government to adopt the structure chosen for the tube PPP; which companies they worked for; and who they work for now. [66495]

Mr. Jamieson: The Government sought a wide range of views before deciding to proceed with the manifesto commitment to modernise the underground through a Public Private Partnership.

Public Transport (Safety)

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what safety requirements are imposed on (a) bus operators and (b) train operators to secure luggage to avoid it hitting passengers when (i) braking and (ii) cornering. [65634]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 1 July 2002]: (a) Regulation 100 of the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986 requires that the load carried by a motor vehicle shall at all times be so secured, if necessary by physical restraint other than its own weight, and be in such a position, that neither danger nor nuisance is likely to be caused to any person or property by reason of the load or any part thereof falling from that vehicle.

The Public Service Vehicles (Conduct of Drivers, Inspectors, Conductors and Passengers) Regulations 1990 require that anyone taking a cumbersome or bulky article or one that may cause an annoyance to another passenger shall place it on the vehicle where either the driver, inspector or conductor recommend.

(b) The Health and Safety Executive's (HSE) Railway Safety Principles and Guidance includes guidance on railway construction to ensure that luggage is sufficiently secured to avoid hitting passengers when braking and cornering.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment his Department has made of evidence received as to whether seat belts would (a) save lives and (b) limit injuries in (i) train and (ii) bus crashes. [65638]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 1 July 2002]: The use of seat belts in buses for non-urban operation is estimated by the Department to reduce fatal and serious injuries to seated passengers by 30–40 per cent.

The Department has made no such assessment on the fitting of seat belts to trains. However, the Health and Safety Executive (HSE), which is responsible for monitoring and enforcing safety on the railways, advises that although the use of properly fitting seat belts could in certain circumstances protect passengers in a train accident, it is not persuaded that the fitting of seat belts in trains is a reasonably practicable safety precaution. While some passengers may use seat belts voluntarily, there would be little point in fitting them without reasonable expectation that they would be relatively widely used.

Drug and Alcohol Screening

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what statutory requirements there are for drug and alcohol screening tests for employees of transport companies. [65789]

Mr. Jamieson: There are no statutory screening tests for employees of transport companies.

The Government are aware that many transport operators already have strict policies that may include screening programmes.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce drug screening tests alongside breathalysers for traffic offences. [65790]

Mr. Jamieson: Drug screening is already used by the majority of police forces who have trained officers in the techniques of drug recognition and tests of impairment. Devices that detect the presence of drugs chemically are being developed and tested by a number of commercial companies. If these prove successful and appropriate, they may be used to assist the police at the roadside. Under current legislation the police do not have the same power to test drivers at the roadside for possible drugs as they do for alcohol. It is the Government's intention to amend the legislation to enable this.

Railtrack Group

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, (1) pursuant to his statement of 27 June, what his estimate is of the value of the relief to be offered to Railtrack Group PLC in respect of corporation tax on capital gains; [66508]

(2) pursuant to his statement of 27 June, whether Railtrack employees with shares in Railtrack Group will be exempt from capital gains tax on the realisation of their shares, pursuant to the proposals from Network Rail. [66507]

Mr. Jamieson: The Government have been advised that Railtrack Group should be able to take advantage of the exemptions referred to in paragraphs 24 and 25 of the Non-Statutory Contingent Liability minute laid before the House of Commons on 27 June. This would ensure that, in all likelihood, Railtrack Group incurs no tax liability as a result of the Railtrack plc disposal.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the projects given in Railtrack's Network Management Statement 2001 that, by the end of March 2002, had (a) been completed, (b) been started but not completed, indicating the expected completion date and (c) not been started, indicating the expected start date. [66601]

Mr. Jamieson: Railtrack advise that details of the work identified in the 2001 Network Management Statement (NMS) against details of work that has been completed, started but not completed, and of work that has not been started, will form a paper to be published as part of an update to the 2001 NMS. It is expected that this will be published in the summer of 2002.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what duty is placed on the administrators of Railtrack PLC to provide accurate and timely information to Railtrack Group. [66529]

Mr. Jamieson: This is a matter for the Administrators who are Officers of the High Court.

Asset Maintenance Plan

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on (a) the timing, (b) the responsibility for and (c) the basis of preparation of the asset maintenance plan. [66534]

Mr. Jamieson: Railtrack's duties in respect of asset maintenance are primarily those set out in its network licence, in particular Conditions 7 and 24. Railtrack also has duties set out in regulated track access agreements with train operating companies. Railtrack produced asset maintenance plans for civil engineering (track and structures) in 1998 and for signalling assets in 1999. These formed critical inputs to the Rail Regulator's periodic review of access charges which concluded in October 2000. Railtrack also must produce a Network Management Statement (NMS) annually, in compliance with Condition 7 of its network licence. The NMS sets out how the company will manage the operation, efficiency and capability of its assets to meet the reasonable requirements of its customers.

Night Flights

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the Government's appeal against the decision of the European Court of Human Rights on the banning of night flights will be heard; and if he will make a statement. [65565]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) on 19 December 2001, Official Report, columns 519–20W. The Judgment of the Third Section of the Court, issued on 2 October 2001, would not require a ban on night flights. The hearing before the Grand Chamber of the Court in the case of Hatton and Others v. the United Kingdom is scheduled for 9 October 2002.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received on noise relating to night flights at East Midlands airport. [65563]

Mr. Jamieson: I and my Department received over recent months a substantial number of personal and written representations on this subject, some advocating and others opposing designation of the airport for the purpose of imposing night restrictions.

Pedestrian Environment

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has conducted into improving the pedestrian environment for the disabled; if he will place a copy of results in the Library; and if he will list schemes introduced in the last two years to improve the pedestrian environment for the disabled. [66613]

Mr. Jamieson: My Department has carried out a wide range of research over a number of years aimed at improving access to the pedestrian environment for disabled people. Research findings have been disseminated in the form of guidance for local authorities and others.

We are currently finalising a comprehensive guidance document based on research to establish best practice in providing for disabled people both in the pedestrian environment and in transport infrastructure. "Inclusive Mobility—A Guide to Best Practice on Pedestrian and Transport Infrastructure" has been produced by my Department with support from Transport for London, the Institution of Highways and Transportation, the County Surveyor's Society, the Association of Transport Co-ordinating Officers and the Passenger Transport Executive Group. The guidance will help local authorities and transport providers to understand and fulfil their duties under Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1985. I will place a copy in the Library when it is published.

We do not hold details of individual schemes that have been introduced by local authorities.

Heathrow Terminal 5

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the statement by the right hon. Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers), Official Report, 20 November 2001, column 178, on Heathrow Terminal 5, when he will open the consultation on extending the night quota period; and if he will make a statement. [65567]

Mr. Jamieson: We aim to commence consultation on all aspects of the next night noise regime for the BAA London airports before the end of this year. It is likely to be a two stage process.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the statement by the right hon. Member for North Tyneside, Official Report, 20 November 2001, column 178, on Heathrow Terminal 5, if he will make a statement on Government policy on the limit on the number of flights at Heathrow when Terminal 5 at Heathrow is built. [65566]

Mr. Jamieson: The Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions imposed a condition on the planning consent for Heathrow Terminal 5, requiring that from the date the core terminal building opens for public use, the number of occasions on which aircraft may take-off or land at Heathrow shall not exceed 480,000 during any period of one year.

West Coast Main Line

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of the West Coast Main Line upgrade; and if he will make a statement. [66549]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 8 May 2002, Official Report, column 216W, to the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Duncan).

East Midlands Airport

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria he used to determine that East Midlands Airport should not be designated under section 78 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 in relation to night flights. [65564]

Mr. Jamieson: The decision not to designate the airport is explained in my letter of 18 June to North West Leicestershire district council. I have placed a copy of that letter in the Library of the House.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what meetings he or his predecessor had with representatives of North West Leicestershire district council prior to his decision not to designate East Midlands airport under section 78 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 in relation to night flights. [65562]

Mr. Jamieson: I met representatives of North West Leicestershire district council, along with others, on 13 November last, to discuss this matter. Subsequently the Department also received further written representations from the council.

Strategic Rail Authority

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the (a) subsidiary companies, (b) agencies and (c) other boards to the Strategic Rail Authority, giving their (i) responsibilities, (ii) powers and (iii) current turnovers. [66596]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority has the following subsidiaries:

Company name	Activity	Issued share capital	Percentage SRA control
BRB (Residuary) Ltd.	Custodian of property, rights and liabilities previously belonging to the British Railways Board.	1	100
Rail Documentation and Drawing Services Ltd.	Custodian of rolling stock drawing and documents.	1	100
DoA Ltd.	DoA Ltd. was acquired by SRA Investment Company Ltd. on 1 October 2001 for £1 from the former DTLR. DoA Ltd. holds deeds of assumption with passenger transport executives (PTEs) requiring the repayment of capital sums and interest to the PTEs.	1	100
SRA Investment Company Ltd.	On 1 July 2001, the authority acquired SRA Investment Company Ltd. for the purpose of holding shares in new ventures in which the authority has an interest. It currently has a 100 per cent. holding in DoA Ltd. and a 50 per cent. holding in Cross London Rail Links Ltd.	100	100
Cross London Rail Links Ltd.	On 1 August 2001, the SRA Investment Company, together with Transport Trading Ltd. acquired Cross London Rail Links Ltd. This is a joint venture for the purpose of undertaking development and design work for two new train routes across London.	100	50
Bridge Rail Ltd.	Dormant	1	100
British Rail Engineering Ltd.	Dormant	1,000,000	100
British Rail Ltd.	Dormant	1	100
British Railways Board Ltd.	Dormant	1	100
British Transport Hotels Ltd.	Dormant	9,582,537	100
Britravel Nominees Ltd.	Dormant	100	100

SRA Transport Ltd.	Dormant	5,000	100
Thameslink 2000 Ltd.	Dormant	2	100
Tower Rail Ltd.	Dormant	2	100

Notes:

1. No current turnover figures are available for the dormant companies or the recently formed companies.

2. The latest available figure for BRB (Residuary) Ltd. is £4.7 million for the two months following formation of the subsidiary to the end of March 2001.

East London Line

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the start of construction works on the southern extension of the East London Line. [64294]

Mr. Jamieson: London Underground are currently undertaking advance works on the northern extension. The Strategic Rail Authority, together with Transport for London and London Underground, is looking at the programme for the project as a whole, including the southern extension, as part of a project review. The review should be completed in the autumn.

Public Transport (West Sussex)

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to improve co-ordination between local bus and rail services in West Sussex. [66146]

Mr. Spellar: As part of the Government's Local Transport Plan process, West Sussex county council are introducing a number of initiatives through their plan to improve links between bus and rail services. These include the upgrade of 6 interchange stations (at Worthing, Chichester, Three Bridges, Haywards Heath, Crawley and Horsham), improvements to Railbus links, particularly with new housing developments, and the introduction and improvement of Passenger Information Terminals and freephone telephone links to the County's travel information line.

Coastal Emergency Planning

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has held with local authorities regarding a new statutory duty for coastal emergency planning. [63748]

Mr. Jamieson: As part of the review process which culminated in the publication of the revised "National Contingency Plan for Marine Pollution from Shipping and Offshore Installations" in January 2000, officials of my Department engaged in discussions, in a working group which included representatives of local authorities, on the subject of a statutory duty to plan for shoreline clean-up and to implement such plans following marine pollution incidents.

More recently, the issue of emergency planning has been addressed in the Government's Emergency Planning Review. In the event of a generic statutory emergency planning duty being introduced under new legislation following that Review, the question would arise as to whether such a duty should apply to coastal local authorities' preparation of contingency plans for shoreline clean-up.

Road Safety

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to promote safer driving. [63727]

Mr. Jamieson: One of our key road safety goals is to improve the standard of driving and our road safety strategy sets out a number of measures to achieve this. In particular we want to ensure that drivers obtain better skills and gain more experience before they take the driving test.

Quiet Road Surfacing

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, column 776W, on quiet road surfacing, if he will list the proportion of quiet road surfacing in each case according to road classification. [66066]

Mr. Jamieson: The information required to answer the question is not recorded centrally.

Rural Bus Challenge

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the wards served by the projects that are supported by the Rural Bus Challenge; [66566]

(2) when he will announce the results of the latest Rural Bus Challenge. [66565]

Mr. Jamieson: The results of the Rural Bus Challenge 2001 competition were announced in January this year, and we anticipate the results of the 2002 competition to be announced early next year.

A list of the projects that have been awarded Rural Bus Challenge funding in each of the four competitions since it was introduced in 1998 is deposited in the Library of the House. A total of £69.8 million has been awarded to 213 schemes.

Variable Speed Limits

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research has been conducted (a) by and (b) for his Department on the effect of variable speed limits; and if he will make a statement. [66005]

Mr. Jamieson: The Transport Research Laboratory (TRL) monitored trials on the effectiveness of variable speed limits outside schools. Variable message signs were installed outside schools that reduced the speed limit typically one hour around school arrival and leaving times. The results showed very little reduction in vehicle speeds and the report concluded that as a speed reducing feature they were ineffective.

Road Maintenance Backlog

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how he will ensure that funds allocated to local authorities to clear the road maintenance backlog are used for this purpose. [66010]

Mr. Jamieson: The Best Value regime, introduced by the Local Government Act 1999, requires continuous improvement in highway maintenance. Authorities are required to report annually against Best Value indicators, which measure carriageway condition on all classes of local authority roads.

DfT is working with local authorities to develop highway management systems which will lead to more consistent standards and a better system for effective targeting of resources.

Light Transport Schemes

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the light rail schemes in operation, giving (a) the start date of operation and (b) the Government body responsible for oversight. [66577]

Mr. Jamieson: There are currently six light rail schemes in operation, as listed in the table. The Health and Safety Executive is responsible for the regulation of tram and light rail systems and tram drivers must also comply with certain highways legislation, enforced by the police.

Light rail scheme	Start date
Tyne and Wear Metro	Original system opened between 1980 and 1984 Newcastle airport extension opened 1991 Extension to Sunderland and South Hylton opened on 31 March 2002
Docklands Light Railway (London)	First phase opened 1987 Bank extension opened 1991 Beckton extension opened 1994 Lewisham extension opened 1999
Manchester Metrolink	Altrincham-Bury opened 1992 Extension to Salford Quays and Eccles opened in 1999 and 200[illegible] respectively
South Yorkshire Supertram (Sheffield)	Opened in stages during 1994–95
Midland Metro	Opened in 1999
Croydon Tramlink	Opened in June 2000

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many light rail passengers there have been in each of the last five years. [66570]

Mr. Jamieson: The following is the most recent information available:

Million

Year	Number of light rail passenger journeys
1996–97	73
1997–98	79
1998–99	85
1999–2000	94
2000–01	120

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on each proposed light rail scheme under consideration. [66578]

Mr. Jamieson: The light rail schemes currently being appraised by the Department for Transport on which promoters are seeking a provisional view before possible Transport and Works Act applications, are as follows:

Merseytram Line 1

Manchester Metrolink—Stockport Extension.

In addition, my officials are also appraising the proposed upgrade to the Blackpool Tramway.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, column 773W, on light transport schemes, if he will (a) list the occasions on which his Department has met the promoters of individual schemes, giving the scheme and promoter in each case, (b) list the schemes to which information, support and guidance has been given and (c) list the occasions on which workshops on light rail and guided bus schemes have taken place, giving the scheme on each occasion, since 7 June 2001. [66046]

Mr. Jamieson: The following charts contain the available information on meetings and workshops. In addition, information, support and guidance has been provided by my Department and the relevant Government Office to the promoters of every scheme to the extent requested, by telephone, email or post.

List A—Meetings held with promoters of light rail schemes since 7 June 2001

Scheme and Promoter	Number of meetings
Blackpool Tram—Blackpool borough council	2
Bristol and South Gloucestershire Tram Scheme—Bristol city council and South Gloucester council	3
Croydon Tramlink	2
Docklands LR	1
Hull LRT—Hull city council	1
Leeds Supertram—West Yorkshire Passenger Transport Executive	3
Manchester Metrolink Extensions—Greater Manchester Passenger Transport Executive	9
Merseytram—Merseytravel	5
Midland Metro—Centro	1
Nottingham Express Transit—Nottingham city council	3
South Hampshire Rapid Transit—Hampshire county council	2
South Yorkshire Supertram Extensions—South Yorkshire Passenger Transport Executive	3
Meetings held with promoters of guided bus schemes since 7 June 2001
Barnsley Interchange and Busway—South Yorkshire Passenger Transport Executive	1
South Bradford Integrated Transport Scheme—Bradford city council	1
Cambridge Guided Bus—Cambridge county council	1
Cambridge Guided Bus—Cambridge Rapid Transport System (Commercial)	1
Chester Deeside Transport Scheme—Chester city council	2
Doncaster Bus—South Yorkshire Passenger Transport Executive	4
Crawley Fastway—West Sussex county council	3
Kent Fastrack—Kent county council	2
Leeds A65—West Yorkshire Passenger Transport Executive	1
Luton-Dunstable Translink—Bedfordshire county council and Luton borough council	5

List B—Workshops

Workshops
Workshop on monitoring processes for light rail schemes in operation	29 June 2001	Approximately 45 attended from various promoters.
Workshop on light rail appraisal	21 February 2002	Approximately 45 attended from various promoters.
Workshop on other major public transport schemes including guided bus	1 March 2002	Approximately 50 attended from various promoters.
'Surgery' on funding/appraisal issues before submission of annual progress reports (31 July 2002)	19 and 20 June 2002	Attendance included one guided bus scheme.

Road Widening

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what schemes for road widening under the 10-year plan have been (a) proposed, (b) accepted and (c) started; what the location and length of road is in each case; what research has been conducted into the effects on (i) traffic, (ii) safety, (iii) congestion, (iv) social and environmental impacts and (v) economic effects in each case; and if he will make a statement. [66310]

Mr. Jamieson: There are currently 15 on-line widening schemes in our targeted programme of improvements (TPI). As with all such schemes a substantial amount of assessment work is undertaken which looks at the current situation and the impact of the proposals. This is published during the statutory procedures and may be debated at a public inquiry, if one is necessary, and then by the Secretary of State when deciding whether to authorise the making of the necessary orders.

The following such schemes are under construction:

A1 Willowburn to Denwick Improvement (Northumberland—4.2km)

A11 Roudham Heath to Attleborough Dualling (Norfolk—9.9km)

A43 M40 to B4031 Dualling (Oxfordshire—6.5km)

A46 Newark to Lincoln Improvement (Lincolnshire—28km).

Construction on the following will start in the next financial year:

M25 J12–15 Widening (Surrey—10.9km)

M60 J5–8 (Greater Manchester—7.4km).

And statutory procedures have still to be completed on the following schemes:

A74(M) Carlisle to Guardsmill upgrading to motorway (Cumbria—9km)

A1 Bramham to Wetherby (N. Yorkshire—9km)

A1 Dishforth to Leeming (N. Yorkshire—22km)

A1 Leeming to Barton (N. Yorkshire—16km)

A2 Bean to Cobham Widening Phase 1 (Kent—4.1km)

A2 Bean to Cobham Widening Phase 2 (Kent—6.5km)

A11 Fiveways to Thetford Improvement (Suffolk—14.9km)

A11 Attleborough Bypass Improvement (Norfolk—5.5km)

A46 Newark to Widmerpool Improvement (Nottinghamshire—28km).

Other widening schemes have been proposed as possible solutions to transport problems being investigated under the programme of multi-modal (MMS) and road based studies. So far the only widening scheme which the Secretary of State has accepted coming out of an MMS is the proposal to widen the A14 between Cambridge and Huntingdon and the Cambridge Northern Bypass. The Highways Agency are now undertaking more detailed work on the scheme design than was possible during the study with a view to it being added to the TPI in the near future. Again substantial work will be undertaken on all the effects of the scheme during future statutory processes.

Journey Times

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent research has been conducted (a) for and (b) by his Department on predicting journey times for (i) freight, (ii) passengers and (iii) car journeys; and if he will make a statement. [66312]

Mr. Jamieson: The Highways Agency has carried out research to investigate the feasibility of providing road users with predictions of journey times to selected local destinations, such as airports, for display on variable message signs.

The Highways Agency has recently completed a study of journey times experienced around motorways in the west midlands and is presently considering options for wider promulgation of the results of the study.

The Highways Agency is also analysing the suitability of journey time data collected by a number of systems both within the Agency and developed by the private sector, for the purposes of scheme evaluation by the Agency.

The Department is undertaking research at present to provide a better understanding of the causes of journey time variability in congested conditions on motorways.

EU Working Time Directive

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (a) guidance and (b) legislation (i) has been given or is in place and (ii) is planned by his Department on the EU Working Time Directive; and if he will make a statement. [66321]

Mr. Jamieson: My Department is responsible for implementing the EU directive on the organisation of the working time of persons performing mobile road transport activities (2002/15/EC). This directive was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities on 23 March 2002, and is scheduled to come into force in the UK by 23 March 2005.

No formal guidance on the directive has been produced at this stage. However, we are currently consulting with key representatives from both sides of industry on the transposition of the directive.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is responsible for guidance on and the implementation of domestic legislation relating to the original working time directive (93/104/EC) and the horizontal amending directive (2000/34/EC).

Channel Tunnel

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer of 11 June 2002, Official Report, column 1133W, on the Channel Tunnel, for what reason Government policy towards payment for security measures at the Channel Tunnel has changed; and for what reason the SRA will be asked to contribute to such costs. [66581]

Mr. Jamieson: There has been no change in policy. The SRA originally offered assistance, which is for security at the Frethun freight yard, not the tunnel itself, in December last year. The objective is to bring forward to the earliest possible date the resumption of full and reliable international rail freight services.

Cycling

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many cycling trips were made and what the total distance travelled by cyclists was in each of the last four years. [66571]

Mr. Jamieson: Figures for Great Britain from the national Travel Survey are as follows:

	1997	1998	1999	2000
Trips per person per year	18	15	17	16
Stages per person per year	18	15	17	17
Distance per person per year	41	36	42	37

Note:

Figures for 2001 are not yet available. Stages include all travel by bicycle but trips only include those where cycling was the main mode of travel. Averages are taken over all the population living in households, not just cyclists. The volatility of the single year figures is likely to be a result of the relatively small sample sizes and the geographical clustering of the sample. Cycling patterns over individual years are also very dependent on the weather.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has commissioned into making (a) cycling and (b) walking routes safer; if he will place a copy in the Library; and if he will list those schemes introduced in the last two years in order to make these routes safer. [66579]

Mr. Jamieson: Details of a number of current research projects on cycling and walking are listed in the "Road Safety Research, Compendium of Research Projects 2001–02" and in "Roads and Local Transport Research Programme Compendium of Research Projects 2000–01". The compendia are updated at regular intervals, deposited at the House of Commons Library, and are available on the Department's website. A list of schemes to make walking and cycling routes safer is not recorded centrally.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what Government funding was provided directly for cycle lanes in each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement; [66575]

(2) how much money was allocated to local authorities in each of the last four years for the provision of cycle lanes. [66574]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department has not funded any cycle lanes in the last four years. Since December 1999 local transport capital allocations have been provided to English local authorities outside London through the local transport plan system. Apart from major local transport schemes (those with a gross cost exceeding £5 million) funding is allocated in the form of a single block allocation the use of which is at the authorities discretion. Such funds can be used to implement cycle lanes but it is for authorities to decide their local priorities.

In the first three years of local transport plan system, total single block allocations were as follows:

2002–03	1,200
2003–04	1,100
2004–05	514

Comparable figures for 1999–2000 are not available.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the total length of cycle lanes is in the UK; and what percentage of these are (a) on the side of the carriageway, (b) on the pavement and (c) independent of a road or pavement. [66573]

Mr. Jamieson: This information is not held centrally. Local cycling strategies contain plans for up to 4,300 km of new cycle routes in England by 2005, but it is for individual local traffic authorities to monitor and hold the details of cycle lane provision in the area they control.

Multi-modal Studies

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (a) guidance has been given by his Department and (b) legislation is in place with regard to the methodology for multi-modal studies (i) proposals and (ii) assessment; and if he will make a statement. [66311]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department issued Guidance on the Methodology for Multi-Modal Studies (GOMMMS) in March 2000. In addition one errata; two supplementary pieces of GOMMMS guidance; and a report commissioned by the Department on 'Soft Factors Likely To Affect Travel Demand' have been published since that date. All of these documents can be found on the Departmental website at:

http://www.roads.dft.gov.uk/roadnetwork/heta/hetapubs.htm

There is no legislation in place relating to the methodology for multi-modal studies.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, columns 769–70W, on multi-modal studies, if he will list the (a) number, (b) type, (c) length, (d) expected impact on the numbers of passengers and journeys and (e) expected impacts on congestion and pollution of bus schemes (i) proposed, (ii) accepted and (iii) under way for each of the multi-modal studies that have reported; [66069]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, columns 769–70W, on multi-modal studies, if he will list the (a) number, (b) type, (c) length, (d) expected impact on the numbers of passengers and journeys and freight volume and (e) expected impacts on congestion and pollution of rail schemes (i) proposed, (ii) accepted and (iii) underway for each of the multi-modal studies that have reported. [66073]

Mr. Jamieson: The multi-modal studies are strategic transport studies which examine the contribution that combinations of measures, covering, among other things, roads, rail, public transport and behavioural change initiatives, could make to resolving the transport problems in the study areas. Information about specific measures in isolation is not available in the detail requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2002, Official Report, columns 769–70W, on multi-modal studies, if he will list the (a) number, (b) type, (c) length, (d) expected impact on the number of road journeys and freight volumes and (e) expected impacts on congestion and pollution of road building schemes (i) proposed, (ii) accepted and (iii) underway for each of the multi-modal studies that have reported. [66074]

CABINET OFFICE

Regulatory Impact Assessments

35. Dr. Cable: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps he is taking to ensure that regulatory impact assessments are consistent between Government Departments. [63751]

Mr. Alexander: The Cabinet Office issues guidance to Departments on producing regulatory impact assessments. This guidance follows the methodology set out in the Treasury publication "Appraisal and Evaluation in Central Government", and it is currently being updated and reviewed. It will be subject to a public consultation starting in the summer. The final version will be issued by the end of 2002.

Emergency Planning Procedures

36. Tom Brake: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will make a statement on changes to emergency planning procedures implemented since June 2001. [63752]

Mr. Alexander: Since June 2001, the Government has carefully reviewed civil protection arrangements across the UK. As a result, measures have been taken by Government Departments, the emergency services and local authorities to improve assessment, detection, protection, planning and response to a wide range of threats.

Deregulation

37. Paul Flynn: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what new proposals he has to improve the efficiency of Government Departments by means of deregulation. [63754]

Mr. Alexander: The Office of Public Service Reform (OPSR) is working on several projects that aim to reform the workings of Central Government. They include:

The Departmental Change Programme is designed to ensure that Government Departments and services are equipped to achieve a step change in delivery of outcomes, consistent with the four principles of public service reform.

Improving Programme and Project Delivery to improve the civil service's capability and capacity to deliver efficient Government.

The Regulatory Impact Unit has developed collaboratively with other Departments the Policy effects framework; a strategy for avoiding unnecessary bureaucratic from new policy.

Performance and Innovation Unit

38. Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list his Department's responsibilities with regard to the Performance and Innovation Unit. [63755]

Mr. Alexander: As announced on 24 June, the Performance and Innovation Unit will be brought together with the Forward Strategy Unit to form a single unit called the Strategy Unit.

The Strategy Unit will carry out long-term strategic reviews and policy analysis which can take several forms:

long-term strategic reviews of major areas of policy;

studies of cross-cutting policy issues;

strategic audit, (eg where do the Government stand in relation to their main objectives?); and working with Departments to promote strategic thinking and improve policy making across Whitehall.

I will support the Prime Minister by taking on a ministerial sponsorship role in relation to the work of the Strategy Unit. Lord Macdonald of Tradeston is the sponsor Minister for the current PIU project on risk and uncertainty.

Committee on Standards in Public Life

Mr. Neil Turner: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if the Government plan to submit written evidence to the Committee on Standards in Public Life as a part of its inquiry defining the boundaries within the Executive. [66804]

Mr. Alexander: The Government have today submitted written evidence to the Committee on Standards in Public Life as part of its inquiry into 'Defining the Boundaries within the Executive'. Copies of the submission have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

DEFENCE

Ministerial Meetings (NATO)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met the Secretary-General of NATO; and if he will make a statement. [62185]

Mr. Hoon: I met Lord Robertson on 6–7 June at the NATO Defence Ministers Meeting in Brussels.

The meeting was an important step in the Alliance's preparation for the NATO Prague Summit in November. Alliance Defence Ministers agreed on the need to: improve capabilities, including defence against the threat of terrorism; enlarge in a way that enhances collective security; build on the new security relationship with Russia; develop a more substantive relationship with partners; and adapt to modernise NATO's structures and processes.

Gulf War Syndrome

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department recognises Gulf War Syndrome as a medical condition; and if he will make a statement. [60333]

Mr. Ingram: [holding answer 13 June 2002]: My Department does not recognise "Gulf War Syndrome" as a medical condition. It accepts that some veterans of the 1990–91 Gulf conflict have become ill and that many attribute this ill health to their Gulf experience. A large number of multi-system, multi-organ, non-specific, medically unexplained symptoms have been reported by some Gulf veterans as well as recognised medical conditions. The overwhelming consensus of the scientific and medical community is that there is insufficient evidence to enable this ill-health to be characterised as a unique illness or "syndrome".

Military Sites (Wales)

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide a list of active military sites in Wales. [63196]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence has the following active military establishments in Wales. The list excludes housing and Territorial Army and Cadet sites not owned by MOD.

In addition, there are various radio masts.

Kenley Airfield

Richard Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he plans to change the use of Kenley airfield, Croydon; and if he will make a statement. [63684]

Mr. Ingram: Kenley airfield is currently used by the Air Cadets Voluntary Gliding School. There are no plans to change this usage for the foreseeable future.

Chinook

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons flight data and cockpit voice recorders were not fitted to the RAF Chinook HC2 fleet upon its entry into service. [64561]

Mr. Ingram: The Chinook was introduced into RAF service in 1980 at a time when it was not the Ministry of Defence's policy to install flight data recorders into military aircraft. Since then the policy has changed and such equipment is now installed in all new aircraft.

The decision on retrofitting existing aircraft is considered carefully against a number of factors, such as the type's remaining in-service life, flight safety record, cost and operational considerations. As a result of such considerations, a decision was taken (before the Mull of Kintyre accident) to install an accident data recorder and a cockpit voice recorder, as part of the helicopter health and usage monitoring system modification. This modification has now been installed in the entire in-service Chinook fleet.

Asymmetric Surface Threats

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's work to increase the protection for Royal Navy warships against asymmetric surface threats operating in the littoral; what trials his Department has conducted to evaluate current and future warship weaponry against such threats; and when such trials were begun. [64809]

Mr. Ingram: It is not our policy to comment on the specific details of measures taken to protect fleet units against asymmetric attack, and I am withholding this information in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information which relates to defence, security and international relations. The Royal Navy keeps tactics and measures in this area under constant review. Trials and training are conducted on a regular basis.

Balkans

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the UK military commitment to the Balkans. [64813]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 13 June 2002, Official Report, columns 1343–44, to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer).

Discussions are continuing on how we will adjust our troop contributions in light of the Joint Operational Area Review.

Helicopters

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for the replacement of (a) Lynx, (b) Gazelle and (c) Sea King helicopters at RNAS Yeovilton. [64618]

Mr. Ingram: The Battlefield Light Utility Helicopter project, planned to enter service from the middle of this decade, is intended to replace the capability provided by the Lynx Marks 7 and 9 and the Gazelle. The Surface Combatant Maritime Rotorcraft (SCMR) project will replace the capability currently provided by the Maritime Lynx Marks 3 and 8. SCMR is currently planned to enter service towards the end of this decade. A number of existing helicopter designs are potentially able to meet these requirements, including the Future Lynx proposal from Westlands Helicopter Ltd., and these will be considered further in the assessment phases of these projects.

The Support Amphibious and Battlefield Rotorcraft programme is designed to replace the capability provided by the Sea King Mk4 early in the next decade. The project is in its early stages and we have yet to decide on how the capability requirement will best be met.

On current plans the Lynx, Gazelle and Sea King helicopters (and their replacements) currently based at RNAS Yeovilton will continue to be based there. The planning assumption for naval helicopters to remain at Yeovilton will be reviewed when the Harrier force departs in 2006.

Amber Fox

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans there are for the EU to take over the operation Amber Fox; and if he will make a statement. [64812]

Mr. Ingram: NATO has been invited by the Macedonian Government to extend the mandate of Operation Amber Fox for a further four months until 26 October 2002. The Netherlands took over from Germany as lead nation on 26 June 2002.

At its recent meeting in Seville, the European Council expressed the European Union's willingness to take over from NATO in Macedonia at the end of NATO's current mandate provided that the permanent arrangements between the EU and NATO are in place by then.

Any follow-on mission would be at the invitation of the Macedonian Government.

Sub-continent (Weapons Capability)

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations his Department has received concerning the acquisition by India of Hawk aircrew training simulators. [65427]

Mr. Hoon: I am not aware of any such representations.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what discussions he has held with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry since December 2001 regarding arms export licence grants to (a) India and (b) Pakistan; [65448]

(2) what licence applications his Department has examined for arms exports to (a) Pakistan and (b) India since January 2000; and how many his Department (i) supported and (ii) opposed. [65425]

Mr. Hoon: I am withholding this information in accordance with Exemption 2 (Internal Discussions and Advice) of Part II of the Government's Code of Practice on Access to Government information.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his policy is on arms sales to India and Pakistan. [65404]

Mr. Hoon: All relevant export licence applications for India and Pakistan are considered on a case by case basis against the Consolidated EU and national arms export licensing criteria, in the light of the answer given on 15 March 2002, Official Report, columns 1296–98W by my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bradshaw) to my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love). The Government are keeping a very close eye on developments in the region and continue to apply the Consolidated EU and national arms export licensing criteria carefully and rigorously.

DECS PPP

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what savings he expects to achieve for the DECS PPP (a) as a result of changes in management practice and (b) as a result of inventory effectiveness; and what savings the DECS PPP has achieved so far. [64801]

Mr. Ingram: The Defence Electronic Commerce Services (DECS) Public Private Partnership (PPP) provides an electronic portal and associated infrastructure through which we can do business more effectively with our industrial partners. DECS hosts software applications, each of which are contracted individually. The first service, covering e-purchasing, has already enabled the DLO's Non-Project Procurement Office to generate savings of over £350,000 and the savings for May 2002 alone were estimated to exceed £100,000 when compared to the cost of transacting business in the traditional manner. We expect further savings to be generated as the DECS applications are developed and become more widely used across the Department. However, because DECS is designed to enable the defence acquisition community to operate more effectively, savings are not broken out and attributed directly to the system itself, or to management practise or inventory effectiveness.

Defence Attachés

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the overall cost was of defence attachés in each financial year since 1999–2000. [65271]

Mr. Ingram: The overall cost of defence attachés in each financial year since 1999–2000 is as follows:

£ million

Financial year	Cost
1999–2000	23.895
2000–01	25.455
2001–02	28.704

The Queen Mother

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his letter of 25 June to the hon. Member for Pendle, how many service personnel were involved in the funeral of HM Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother. [65255]

Mr. Ingram: 2,922 service personnel, including Commonwealth troops and service chiefs, were involved in the funeral of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother.

Merlin

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to give the Merlin helicopter an air to surface capability. [66032]

Mr. Ingram: There are no current plans to equip the Merlin helicopter with an air to surface capability. This is being kept under review.

Colchester Garrison

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Investment Advisory Board has given consideration to the Colchester garrison PFI; and if he will make a statement. [66255]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence's Investment Approvals Board advises Ministers on major defence investment projects. The Board expects to consider this project again in the near future.

NATO Defence Ministers' Meeting

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals were made by the US Administration prior to the recent NATO Defence Ministers' meeting; and if he will place the relevant papers and letters from the US Administration in the Library. [66256]

Mr. Hoon: This is a matter for the United States Administration.

Royal Navy Bases

David Cairns: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future basing of Royal Navy ships and submarines and the future requirement for three naval bases. [66801]

Mr. Ingram: A joint Royal Navy/Warship Support Agency study team has recently completed a wide-ranging review of the base porting arrangements for Royal Navy warships and Royal Fleet Auxiliaries, and the infrastructure required to support them. Their recommendations have been endorsed by Ministers, and will be implemented subject to trade union consultation.

The three existing naval bases at Portsmouth, Devonport and Clyde are able to provide sufficient capacity to support the ships and submarines that are in-service, on order or planned.

The future aircraft carrier—the CVF—will be based at HM naval base Portsmouth. While it should be possible to berth two CVFs in Portsmouth simultaneously, for military reasons this may not be desirable. Options are therefore being considered to make use of an occasional stand-by berth for the high-readiness CVF. Further work on the design, operating patterns and manning are needed before a final decision can be made, although initial indications who show that Southampton could provide such a facility if required.

As has been previously announced on 26 June 2002, Official Report, column 908W the batches one and two of Astute Class submarines will be based at HM naval base Clyde, and the Trafalgar Class will remain at Devonport.

With regard to the remainder of the fleet, the T45 Destroyers will progressively replace the T42 Destroyers based at Portsmouth. The two new amphibious ships, HMS Albion and HMS Bulwark, will join HMS Ocean at Devonport, creating an amphibious shipping centre of expertise. The current arrangements for the Vanguard Class nuclear powered ballistic missile Submarines, Frigates, Survey Ships and Minor War Vessels work well and will not be changed.

Type 45 Procurement

Mike Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the RAND report on type 45 procurement options has been published; and if he will make a statement. [66802]

Mr. Ingram: The RAND report on acquisition options for the type 45 destroyer has now been published. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

RAND is a very experienced and influential organisation and has been conducting analyses of military shipbuilding, the industrial base, and competition issues for two decades. The Ministry of Defence commissioned RAND last year to carry out an independent study into a range of alternative procurement strategies for our future warship programme over the next 15–20 years, with particular reference to options for type 45 destroyers. This followed receipt of an unsolicited bid from BAES Marine proposing that they should build all 12 ships planned for the class. This differed from the type 45 shipbuilding procurement strategy at that time which envisaged Vosper Thornycroft building one of the first batch of three ships and competing with BAES Marine for later batches.

Initial results from the study were used to help inform the MOD's decision to proceed with a revised procurement strategy for the type 45, in which each of the two shipbuilders, BAES Marine and Vosper Thornycroft, will be allocated modules (or blocks) of the ship to build. The revised strategy was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 10 July 2001, Official Report, columns 675–85.

RAND's analysis indicated that there would be roughly an even chance that competitive production of the type 45 by two shipbuilders would yield about the same overall cost as sole-source production. Noting that a competitive strategy could lead to one shipbuilder building most of the ships, RAND also investigated alternative strategies to direct work to each of the two shipbuilders to keep both involved in building warships.

The RAND results also suggested that, for strategies that directed type 45 work to a number of shipyards, allocation of blocks is more cost-effective than the allocation of whole ships, because the work force increases productivity as it gains experience of building the same blocks. Such a strategy will also have the advantage of keeping both shipbuilders in the type 45 programme and potentially available to compete for future warship programmes. In addition, the revised strategy is likely to provide better value for money in the longer term than the unsolicited proposal, if it enables competition to be pursued on other warship programmes.

Following the type 45 decision, RAND continued their study, taking a broader look at the foreseeable balance of demand and supply in the warship building sector, and the potential effects of different procurement approaches. The report does not make specific recommendations concerning procurement strategies for future programmes, although it has helped clarify issues regarding block production (which is likely to be employed for the future carrier). It also provides an indication of the size of work force that will be required to sustain the future programme.

RAND's work has already helped the MOD to arrive at a pragmatic solution for the type 45. The report will also provide a valuable source of information for further study of the warship building sector.

Amphibious Assault Capability

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which warships capable of providing an amphibious assault capability will be available in (a) 2002 and (b) 2003; and if he will make a statement. [64819]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 7 March 2002, Official Report, column 474W, to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey). The amphibious assault capability is currently provided by the Landing Platform Helicopter (LPH) HMS Ocean and four Landing Ships Logistic (LSL). Following a series of highly successful operational deployments, HMS Ocean will shortly enter a docking period to conduct essential maintenance and planned capability enhancement, and will be unavailable for tasking until the autumn. During this period the amphibious assault capability could, if required, be provided by HMS Ark Royal in the LPH role and other platforms as may be required.

In 2003, as well as HMS Ocean and four LSLs, the LPD replacement ship, HMS Albion, will become available to provide our amphibious assault capability. The new ship will be significantly more capable than her predecessor, HMS Fearless, able to deploy embarked forces much more quickly—by air and by sea—and will use new landing craft with 20 per cent. more landing capability and a Ro-Ro type configuration for rapid embarkation of vehicles.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Secondary School Pupils

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will make a statement on her plans to widen the options for study available to secondary school pupils. [65171]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 1 July 2002]: The Green Paper "14–19: extending opportunities, raising standards", proposed increasing curriculum choice for young people from the age of 14. We aim to make sure that there is sufficient flexibility to allow students to pursue their talents and aspirations while maintaining a strong focus on the basics.

The consultation on the Green Paper only closed on 31 May. We are reflecting carefully on the views expressed during the consultation before reaching any decisions. We have indicated in the Green Paper that curriculum changes would be subject to further consultation before their introduction.

In September 2002 we will be introducing eight new vocational GCSEs in some schools. Also, the "Increased Flexibility for 14 to 16-year-olds" programme will enable over 30,000 pupils to undertake part-time vocational courses at further education colleges from September 2002.

Hampshire

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) if she will list the activities pursued by her Department that have had a particular impact on Hampshire since 7 June 2001; [63617]

(2) if she will list those initiatives of her Department which have been applied in Hampshire since June 2001, indicating the level of financial support provided in each case. [63616]

Mr. Stephen Twigg [holding answer 21 June 2002]: The information requested has been placed in the Libraries.

School Ethnicity (Portsmouth, South)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the ethnic ratio is for schools in the Portsmouth, South constituency; and if she will make a statement. [64479]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The information requested is shown in the table.

Percentage of pupils by ethnic group[1] in maintained primary and secondary schools in the Portsmouth, South constituency as at January 2001

	Primary	Secondary
White	92.6	94.3
Black Caribbean	0.2	0.1
Black African	0.3	0.1
Black Other	0.4	0.2
Indian	0.6	0.7
Pakistani	0.1	0.1
Bangladeshi	4.3	2.6
Chinese	0.5	0.6
Other	1.0	1.2
All pupils: per cent.	100.0	100.0
Number of pupils	5,735	5,380

[1] Only pupils of compulsory school age and above were classified according to ethnic group.

Annual Schools Census

Data for 2002 are not yet available by parliamentary constituency.

Annual Leave

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the average annual leave entitlement is for staff in her Department in 2002. [64659]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The annual leave entitlement of staff outside of the senior civil service is 25 days on entry, rising to 30 days after 10 years service. Entitlement for members of the senior civil service is currently set by the Cabinet Office at 30 days.

Records of annual leave entitlement are not kept centrally and therefore information about average entitlement could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Special School Budgets

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what calculations she has made about the impact on special school budgets of the introduction of the (a) upper pay spine and (b) management pay spine. [65535]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 1 July 2002]: The threshold constitutes point 1 of the upper pay scale and all threshold payments made to teachers by maintained schools are fully reimbursed by the Department. The rate of subsequent progression along the upper pay scale is for schools to determine in the light of teacher performance and in accordance with the School Teachers Pay and Conditions Document. The Department is contributing a grant of £90 million to schools in 2002–03, largely to support such progression.

Progress along the leadership group pay scale in maintained schools is also by performance points awarded at the discretion of the governing body. Here, the Department is contributing a further grant worth 60 per cent. of the cost in 2002–03 and schools are contributing 40 per cent.

The grants will support special schools in the same way that they do other maintained schools. The impact on their budgets will depend on the decisions taken by individual schools.

Teachers (Contracts)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of teachers in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools were employed on temporary and short-term contracts at the latest date for which figures are available. [65172]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 1 July 2002]: In maintained nursery and primary schools in England, teachers on contracts of less than one month, working for the whole day on the third Thursday in January 2002, constituted 5 per cent. of all full-time equivalent teachers. These data are provisional.

In maintained secondary schools in England, teachers on contracts of less than one month, working for the whole day on the third Thursday in January 2002, constituted 3 per cent. of all full-time equivalent teachers. These data are provisional.

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how long it is taking the Criminal Records Bureau to process clearance applications by new teachers; if she estimates that all new teachers due to start in September will have clearance in time; if she has contingency plans should applications not be cleared in time; and if she will make a statement. [65776]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 1 July 2002]: The Criminal Records Bureau estimate that it is currently taking, on average, approximately six weeks to produce Disclosures.

The CRB is striving hard to improve the situation. A recovery programme has been introduced, and the Bureau's current expectation is that, by August, the present backlog of applications will have been cleared, and the Bureau will be achieving its previously published service standards of providing 90 per cent. of Enhanced Disclosures within three weeks, and 95 per cent. of Standard Disclosures within one week.

My Department has already put in place contingency arrangements with the CRB. Under those arrangements, CRB staff are trawling the backlog of applications, and checking new applications, to identify those in respect of teachers and other key staff for schools. For those applications the CRB is performing checks of my Departments List 99. If that check is satisfactory the employer or agency will be able to appoint the person provisionally. The full criminal record and police check will be performed and the relevant Disclosure issued by the CRB as soon as possible after that. Those interim arrangements will stay in place until the CRB is fully up to date and meeting its performance standards.

School Absenteeism

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the rate of absenteeism among pupils at (a) primary level and (b) secondary level during the days of SATS tests has been in this academic year; and what differences there were between these rates and dates before and after the SATS tests. [63622]

Mr. Stephen Twigg [holding answer 24 June 2002]: Statistics for this academic year's Key Stage tests are not yet available. The following table shows the percentage of pupils recorded as absent in the (a) Key Stage 2 tests and (b) Key Stage 3 test in all schools in England in 2001:

Percentage

Subject	(a) Key Stage 2	(b) Key Stage 3
English	1	4
Mathematics	1	4
Science	2	5

Data on rates of absence rates before and after the Key Stage tests are not available.

Information from the pupil absence survey for 2000–01 showed that 6.5 per cent. of half days were missed due to authorised absences and 0.7 per cent. due to unauthorised absences in all schools in England.

Higher Education

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, pursuant to her answer, Ref 38091, of 5 March 2002, if she will amalgamate information for performance indicators in higher education in the UK to allow comparison to be made of the socio-economic background of students entering all high ranking universities with those entering all other universities. [41953]

Margaret Hodge: The entry requirements of higher education institutions will vary from course to course and from year to year. Nevertheless, I have set out data which shows the Performance Indicators for the entry of young people by social class to undergraduate courses. The Government introduced aspirational funding for high ranking universities to support their efforts to recruit more young people from state schools. Institutions which currently receive this funding are listed first, followed by other institutions.

[2] The grouped benchmark values for the two sets of institutions are estimates

Students (Portsmouth, South)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of full-time students stayed in education in the Portsmouth, South constituency after the age of (a) 16 and (b) 18 years in (i) 1997 and (ii) 2001; and if she will make a statement. [66469]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: Data on the percentage of students staying on in full-time education are not calculated for areas smaller than LEAs as reliable estimates cannot be made. Participation rates at sub-national level are only available for 16 and 17-year-olds.

The percentage of 16 and 17-year-olds in full-time education in Portsmouth LEA, which includes the constituency of Portsmouth, South, in 1997–98 and 1999–2000, the latest year for which figures are available, is set out in the table:

16 and 17 year olds in full-time education: Portsmouth LEA

Age	1997–98	1999–2000
16	73	70
17	55	55

Participation rates by LEA are published in an annual statistical bulletin, 'Participation in Education and Training by Young People Aged 16 and 17 in Each Local Area and Region, England'.

Primary Schools

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if she will make a statement on recent independent surveys regarding educational standards at primary school level in (a) maths, (b) reading, (c) science, (d) vocabulary and (e) non-verbal ability; and if she will make a statement. [65118]

Mr. Miliband: We are aware of the University of Durham Performance Indicators in Primary Schools (PIPS) tests. The results of the national curriculum Key Stage 2 English tests show a 12 per cent. point increase in the number of pupils achieving the expected level for their age since 1997. That increase is reflected in the reading component which shows a 14 per cent. rise. We are confident of the validity of these increases, as are schools throughout the country.

Bilateral Ministerial Meetings

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when Ministers in her Department have held meetings with Ministers and officials of the Irish Government since 1 June 2000; when and where each meeting took place; which Ministers were involved in each meeting; which Irish Government departments were involved in each meeting; and which Ministers and officials from the Irish Government attended each meeting. [63073]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: From 1 June 2000 there have been no meetings between Ministers in this Department and Ministers and officials from the Republic of Ireland Government.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Foot and Mouth

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many cases there are of disputes over payment between her Department and contractors employed during the foot and mouth epidemic; and what the total value is of unpaid disputed invoices. [53248]

Margaret Beckett [holding answer 29 April 2002]: The accounts of the principal contractors used by DEFRA during the FMD outbreak have been the subject of detailed examination. This has been an extensive exercise as the contractors concerned carried out work to the value of hundreds of millions of pounds involving the generation of tens of thousands of invoices.

As part of the verification and substantiation of contractor invoices, the Department has employed forensic accountants to examine the invoices of 107 of the largest contractors. In total these 107 companies have submitted invoices worth £474 million and, to date, the Department has paid £402 million in respect of these claims. The Department is withholding payment of the remainder until it is satisfied that contractors have provided sufficient evidence of work commissioned and carried out.

Wide-ranging issues have arisen on the accounts. These include legal issues such as matters of contractual interpretation, forensic accountancy issues and evidential issues involving the assessment of both a large amount of documentation and proofing of witnesses.

Some of these disputes will inevitably result in court proceedings although DEFRA remains committed to resolving matters by mediation where appropriate.

Committee Mandates

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the mandate of the Advisory Committee on Rural Development is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [61713]

Mr. Morley: The mandate of the Advisory Committee on Rural Development is set out in Commission Decision 98/235/EC. The UK is not formally represented on the committee; members are directly appointed by the Commission, drawn from across the EU, on the basis of their socio-economic interests.

The Commission, together with member states, is currently conducting a review to bring existing legislation on the conduct of comitology committees into line with Council Decision 1999/468/EC, to "simplify the requirements for the exercise of implementing powers conferred on the Commission". As an obligation to this decision, the Commission undertook to publish an annual report on the working of committees. The first report was deposited in the Libraries of both Houses on 26 February (Com (2001) 783 Final). As part of the review process, the UK Government have encouraged the Commission to produce and maintain an electronic database of every comitology committee, its agendas and recent actions, to be available through its website.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the mandate of the Advisory Committee on the Common Agricultural Policy is; how many times it has met over the last 12 months; what the UK representation on it is; what the annual cost of its work is to public funds; if she will list the items currently under its consideration; if she will take steps to increase its accountability and transparency to Parliament; and if she will make a statement. [61721]

Mr. Morley: The mandate of the Advisory Committee on the Common Agricultural Policy is set out in Commission Decision 98/235/EC. The UK is not formally represented on the committee; members are directly appointed by the Commission, drawn from across the EU, on the basis of their socio-economic interests.

The Commission, together with member states, is currently conducting a review to bring existing legislation on the conduct of comitology committees into line with Council Decision 1999/468/EC, to "simplify the requirements for the exercise of implementing powers conferred on the Commission". Sheep

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she plans to make it her policy to stop sheep that are susceptible to TSEs from breeding. [61552]

Margaret Beckett [holding answer 13 June 2002]: The Government launched a national scrapie plan in July 2001 after full consultation with the sheep industry and other stakeholders. The plan is a long-term programme whose aim is to increase the level of TSE-resistance in the sheep flock by means of breeding programmes which encourage the use of resistant animals. Participation by sheep breeders in the plan is at present on a purely voluntary basis, but as part of the consultation it was made clear that these measures would be made compulsory at some stage.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what schemes the Government have introduced since May 1997 to promote energy conservation and energy efficiency within the services sector; and what their impact has been on energy consumption per square metre within (a) commercial, (b) retail and (c) Government offices. [63373]

Mr. Meacher: The Government has introduced a wide range of measures to encourage energy efficiency in all sectors of the economy, including the commercial, retail and public sectors, which includes the Government Estate. The Climate Change Levy was introduced in April 2001 to encourage the more efficient use of energy. As part of the Climate Change Levy package, an Enhanced Capital Allowance scheme was introduced to provide fiscal incentives for businesses to invest in energy efficient technologies. The Carbon Trust was also set up to encourage business and the public sector to take up low carbon and energy efficient savings and measures.

The Energy Efficiency Best Practice Programme provides free information and advice to these sectors. Since 1997, it has been delivering targeted energy efficiency briefings to boardrooms in the retail sector to raise awareness of energy efficiency, which has had a positive response. The Programme has also concentrated on providing groups within the commercial office sector with information on the business benefits of taking up energy efficiency measures.

The Government Estate has had energy efficiency targets since 1990–91. We introduced a new 1 per cent. per year greenhouse gas reduction target in 2000–01, which will be reported on later this year. We are also developing new energy efficiency targets for the Government Estate, based on an assessment of the Estate's performance against national standards.

The Best Practice Programme estimates its impact on annual energy efficiency improvements for the commercial and retail sectors. Actual consumption and floor space data are not collected on an annual basis, but for calendar years 1998–2000, total energy efficiency improvements stimulated by the Programme are estimated to have been 7 per cent. for the retail sector and 6 per cent. for the commercial sector.

Annual consumption and floor space data are collected for the central Government Estate (excluding Ministry of Defence) to monitor performance against the Estate's energy efficiency target. Energy consumption in the Government Estate per square metre fell by 6 per cent. between 1997–98 and 1999–2000. Since this figure is collected on a different basis from the figures quoted above for the retail and commercial sectors, it cannot be directly compared.

Genetic Engineering

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if he will list the sites in the UK which involve the experimental genetic engineering of plants to provide simple vaccinations; and which of these sites are in receipt of Government financial support. [63917]

Mr. Meacher: There are no trial sites of GM plants in the UK for the production of vaccines under the deliberate release regulations. However, my Department is funding one research project which seeks to produce transgenic plants that express GM antibodies, which will provide protection against E.coli O157:H7 when ingested by livestock. If effective this would have the potential to reduce the level of E.coli O157 in livestock and hence reduce the risk of zoonotic transmission. The total cost of this project over three years and nine months is £350k.

The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) is not aware of any current programmes in the UK which involve the production of GM plants for use as vaccines. They are aware of preliminary research aimed at developing GM apples intended to protect against dental caries, which is being carried out by a dental hospital in collaboration with a horticultural research centre.

A number of centres in the UK are investigating the potential use of GM plant viruses as human or animal vaccines. These centres include the Scottish Crop Research Institute, the John Innes Centre, and Horticulture Research International. These projects which include using Cow Pea Mosaic Virus to deliver human or animal antigens, have been notified to HSE under the Genetically Modified Organisms (Contained Use) Regulations 2000.

Flooding

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what research has been commissioned by her Department on the likely impact of sea level rise on the land area of the United Kingdom; if a map of projected flooded areas has been produced; and if she will make a statement. [64792]

Mr. Morley: Flood Management is a devolved responsibility. The Department has a wide ranging programme of research related to climate change and its impacts. Recent specific research commissioned for flood management has included an assessment by HR

Wallingford Ltd. of Coastal Vulnerability in 2075. This considered the potential impact of sea level rise and related changes for typical coastal defence structures and generally confirmed that current allowances for sea level rise recommended by the Department are reasonable. These allowances are currently being further reviewed in the light of the Climate Impact Scenarios published by the Department earlier this year.

Climate change will increase the pressures on defences and increase the risk of flooding to defended areas, but will not significantly change the current maps of indicative coastal flood risk areas produced by the Environment Agency.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what measures the Government are taking to protect sites of special scientific interest from development. [64708]

Mr. Meacher: In England, Planning Policy Guidance note 9 (PPG9) advises local authorities on nature conservation issues, including the importance of sites of special scientific interest (SSSIs) and how they are to be treated in Local Plans and the planning framework. Planning authorities are required to consult English Nature before granting permission for development in, around or likely to affect SSSIs and to consider using their powers to impose conditions where necessary to avoid any damage to sites. Where a planning authority proposes to grant consent despite advice from English Nature to the effect that adverse impacts are likely to arise, the authority must inform English Nature so that it can consider whether to ask the Deputy Prime Minister to call in the application.

Improved measures to protect SSSIs have been taken by amendments to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, introduced in the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. These concern both owners and occupiers and also public authorities in the exercise of their functions. Additional international nature conservation designations bring further levels of protection.

The Government indicated in the Green Paper—"Planning: delivering a fundamental change"—that it intended to review all PPGs. The review of PPG9 will enable it to be updated to reflect the recent legislative changes.

In Wales, policy on planning and nature conservation is a devolved matter and is the responsibility of the National Assembly.

EU Management Committees

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the EU Management Committee of the common organisations of agricultural markets for beef and veal is next due to meet; whether experts nominated by the Scottish Executive (a) have been and (b) are members of it; and if she will make a statement. [64888]

Mr. Morley: The EU Beef Management Committee is due to meet on 28 June and on 12 July. UK representation depends on the agenda items under discussion. Officials from the Scottish Executive and other devolved administrations attend as necessary in accordance with their interests.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the EU Management Committee of the common organisations of agricultural markets for sheep and goats is next due to meet; whether experts nominated by the Scottish Executive (a) have been and (b) are members; and if she will make a statement. [63930]

Mr. Morley: Under Article 25 of Council Regulation 2529–2001 on the common organisation of the market in sheepmeat and goatmeat the Commission is mandated to establish a management committee to deal with market management of the sector and any matters arising for which the Commission has competence.

Within the previous 12 months the management committee has met on nine occasions. The Sheepmeat Management Committee is due to meet in two months time to review the market situation and the impact of the recent reforms.

UK representation on the EU's Sheep Management Committees depends on the agenda items under discussion. Officials from the Scottish Executive and other devolved administrations attend as necessary in accordance with their interests.

Packaging Waste Directive

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans her Department has to ensure that the EU packaging waste directive is fully (a) implemented and (b) complied with and that it is done so in a way that helps consumers return packaging to suppliers. [64308]

Mr. Meacher: The current EC directive on packaging and packaging waste is fully implemented by the Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 1997 (as amended) and the Packaging (Essential Requirements) Regulations 1998. A revision to the directive has been proposed. When this is finalised it is expected that it will be fully implemented in the UK through amendments to the existing regulations. Compliance with these regulations is monitored by the Environment Agencies. The new directive is expected to include higher targets for the recovery and recycling of packaging waste. As targets increase it will be necessary to recover more packaging material from the household waste stream, and we would therefore expect businesses and local authorities to work together closely to ensure that adequate household collection systems are set up.

International Trade Unit

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many people are employed and at what grades in the international trade unit of her Department. [64468]

Margaret Beckett: On 24 June 2002 staff employed in the international trade unit (International Animal Health Division) were as follows.

Grade	In post	Vacancies
Head of division	1	0
Grade 6	0	2
Head of branch	2	0
Veterinary adviser	6	2
Senior executive officer	3	0
Higher executive officer	9	0
Executive officer	12	4
Administrative officer	23	2
Administrative assistant	16	4
Personal secretary	2	0
Typist	1	0

Fishing

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) in the event that advice on aspects of fisheries management is devolved to regional advisory councils, with which EU member states the Government intends to co-operate in establishing these RACs; and what range of stakeholders she envisages holding membership of them; [64511]

(2) whether she supports the policy of devolving advice on all aspects of fisheries management to regional advisory councils; and which fishing zones she has identified where such RACs can operate. [64512]

Mr. Morley: The Commission's proposals for the establishment of regional advisory councils envisage that they would have the following functions:

(a) to submit suggestions, of their own accord or at the request of the Commission or a member state, on matters relating to fisheries management to the Commission of the member states concerned;

(b) to give opinions on Commission or member state proposals for fisheries management;

(c) to comment on and recommend improvements in the application of Community legislation.

The UK is supportive of the general principle behind the establishment of regional advisory councils, but the precise role to be given to them will be one of the important matters to be addressed in the forthcoming negotiations in the Council of Ministers. Decisions as to the regions to be covered, and the range of stakeholders to be involved and the member states from which they should be drawn, will have to be considered in consultation with interested parties once the Council has established more clearly the remit of the proposed RACs.

Refrigerators

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assistance her Department is planning to give to local councils towards the cost of disposing of refrigerators in this financial year. [64531]

Paddy Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what financial aid has been made available to each local authority to help with the storage and disposal of refrigerators in (a) 2001–02 and (b) 2002–03. [64247]

Mr. Meacher: In December 2001, we announced a payment of £6 million to go to local authorities to cover their costs up until March 2002 for the storage and disposal of refrigerators. We realise local authorities are in need of further funding and intend to make an announcement as soon as possible.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many fridges are awaiting disposal in each (a) waste collection authority and (b) waste disposal authority. [66509]

Mr. Meacher: The exact numbers of fridges being stored pending treatment in either waste collection authority or waste disposal authority at any one point in time are not held centrally. However, current estimates suggest there are around 900,000 units awaiting treatment.

Illegal Meat Products

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what outbreaks of disease in animals in Cumbria have been linked to the imports of illegal meat products in the past five years. [64877]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 June 2002]: The Cumbria Foot and Mouth Disease Inquiry concluded that there is a strong likelihood that the foot and mouth virus that affected the UK during 2001 may have entered the country in an imported animal product—probably illegally imported meat. Prior to 2001, we are not aware of other disease outbreaks in Cumbria that have been linked to illegal meat imports.

The Government published an action plan on 28 March 2002 to reduce the risk of animal and plant disease entering the country and then threatening our public health, and livestock, agriculture and horticulture industries. The action plan includes undertaking a full risk assessment of the probability of illegal animal products reaching susceptible animals and causing disease, the final report of which will be delivered in the Autumn.

Wild Animals

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on her policy relating to the enforcement of statutory constraints on the sale of wild animals. [64376]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 27 June 2002]: We promote the enforcement of wildlife legislation through our joint chairmanship of the Partnership for Action Against Wildlife Crime. The Partnership is a multi-agency body comprising all the main Government and voluntary bodies committed to reducing wildlife crime. One of its main objectives is to support the networks of Police Wildlife Liaison Officers and HM Customs and Excise Wildlife and Endangered Species Officers, who have statutory responsibility for enforcing the controls.

Secondments

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many secondments and exchanges of staff there have been between central and regional Government offices and organisations with a rural remit since November 2000. [65393]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 1 July 2002]: There have been nine exchanges of staff between central and regional Government and 39 exchanges with organisations with a rural remit.

23 staff have been seconded to the European Commission and eight staff to other organisations abroad and those organisations may touch on rural issues.

Air Quality

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs which of the pollutants covered by the National Air Quality Strategy are monitored by each of the main London air quality monitoring sites. [65092]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 1 July 2002]: There are 24 air quality monitoring sites in London reported in the National Air Quality Archive (http://www.airquality.co.uk). The pollutants measured at these sites, site type and their start dates are given in the table.

[1] Site types are described as follows:

Kerbside: A site sampling within 1 metre of the edge of a busy road.

Roadside: A site sampling between 1 metre of the edge of a busy road and the back of the pavement. Typically this will be within 5 metres of the road, with a sampling height of 2–3 metres.

Urban Centre: A non-kerbside site, located in an area representative of typical population exposure in town or city centres (e.g. pedestrian precincts and shopping areas). This is likely to be strongly influenced by vehicle emissions, as well as other general urban sources of pollution. Sampling at or near breathing-zone heights (1.4–4 metres) will be applicable.

Urban Background: An urban location distanced from sources and therefore broadly representative of city-wide background conditions e.g. elevated locations, parks and urban residential areas.

Suburban: A location type situated in a residential area on the outskirts of a town or city. Will be influenced by several sources of pollution including traffic, commercial, space heating, regional transport, urban plume downwind of a city.

[2] Pollutant species: O_3—ozone; NO_x—oxides of nitrogen (include nitrogen dioxide); CO—carbon monoxide; SO_2—sulphur dioxide; PM_{10}—particulate matter of aerodynamic diameter less than 10 micrometres. PM_{10} monitoring is carried out using either the TEOM (Tapered Element Oscillating Microbalance; T in table above) or Gravimetric sampling (G in table above). Monitoring is by TEOM alone unless otherwise stated.

[3] London Marylebone Road is a research site and is used for a variety of monitoring projects mostly involving measurement of airborne particulate matter.

Food Imports

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will bring forward proposals to ban the import of food products produced (a) under conditions and (b) using chemicals that would not be permitted in the United Kingdom. [65150]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 1 July 2002]: European Community rules require all products of animal origin imported from third countries to be produced to standards at least equivalent to those applied to Community production, and to conform to rules limiting or banning the use of certain chemicals. All consignments imported are subject to veterinary checks at an authorised border inspection post to ensure that import requirements have been complied with. Consignments that do not comply are rejected and will be re-exported or destroyed.

Food which is not of animal origin, such as fruit and vegetables, entering the UK from third countries must meet the same food safety standards as apply to food produced in the UK. Under UK national regulations such imports are subject to checks on the basis of risk assessment by local food authorities at the point of entry to the UK and they can refuse entry or arrange destruction of foods that do not meet the UK's requirements.

Food coming to the UK from other EU member states is in free circulation within the EU and is not subject to routine checks at UK ports. Such food can be subject to random, non-discriminatory import checks where there is information to support such action.

From time to time the EU may make Decisions to be acted on by all member states, which require additional inspection or testing of specified foodstuffs.

Oral Questions

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many oral questions she has transferred to other departments in each of the last 18 months. [65509]

Mr. Morley: DEFRA was created in June 2001, and since then the number of oral questions transferred to other Government Departments in each month is shown in the following table.

	Number of oral questions transferred
June 2001	6
October 2001	7
November 2001	2
December 2001	3
January 2002	2

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

G7 Finance Ministers' Meeting

Tony Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the outcome was of the G7 Finance Ministers' meeting on 14 and 15 June regarding funding for education in developing countries; and if she will make a statement. [64669]

John Healey: I have been asked to reply.

At their meeting in Halifax, G7 Finance Ministers noted the World bank's Education Action Plan and strongly endorsed the expeditious implementation of a plan focused on programme quality and measurable results. They pledged that, "each of us in turn will work to support the 'Education for All' goals with countries that have credible education plans and strong policy commitments in place. We urge other donor Governments and the multilateral development banks to join us".

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the effectiveness of NEPAD in bringing good government to Zimbabwe. [66220]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave her on 15 May 2002, Official Report, column 692W.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what part the Crown Agents played in the (a) procurement and (b) supply of the Land-Rover Defender vehicles supplied to the Zimbabwean police as part of a DfID-funded project. [65214]

Clare Short: I suspended this project in May 2000 as it was no longer appropriate given the turbulent political situation and clear evidence of misuse of the vehicles for political ends. The Government of Zimbabwe placed the procurement contract directly with Land Rover Exports Ltd. The Crown Agents were not involved in the contract, but administered the grant account on behalf of the Zimbabwe Government.

Drought (Africa)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to the answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 14W, on Africa, what further financial assistance has been given to (a) Malawi, (b) Mozambique, (c) Zimbabwe and (d) other African countries affected by the drought; and if she will make a statement. [65042]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) on 17 June 2002, Official Report, column 61W.

Arms Trade (Indian Subcontinent)

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations her Department has received regarding the amount of GDP Pakistan spent since 1998 on (a) arms imports in general and (b) arms imports from the United Kingdom. [65451]

Clare Short: My Department has not received any representation since 1998 regarding the amount of GDP Pakistan spent on arms imports in general. DFID is working with the World bank and IMF to track Pakistan's reform programme, including the pattern of fiscal expenditure. Pakistan's defence budget as a percent of GDP has been broadly stable around 4 per cent. over recent years. However, Pakistan's intention to reduce defence spending is under threat given the current stand-off with India.

The total value of UK standard individual export licences (SIEL) applications for which licences were issued in 1999 and 2000 was £11.5 million and £6 million respectively. By contrast, Pakistan's budget defence expenditure between 2000–01 was approximately £1.6 billion.

Sudan

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the aid to be provided to non-departmental organisations to assist the people of Sudan in 2002–03. [64696]

Clare Short: The UK provides humanitarian support to Sudan through non-Government and international organisations. We also support the peace process and the preparation for peace. We expect to spend about £8 million in 2002–3.

EU Directives

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the EU directives and regulations that have been implemented through her Department in 2002; and what was the cost of each to public funds. [64991]

Clare Short: No new directives relating to international development have been implemented through my Department in 2002. The question of cost does not arise.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the EU directives relating to her Department which have been (a) amended and (b) repealed in 2002. [64941]

Clare Short: No EU directives relating to international development matters have been amended or repealed in 2002.

EU Aid

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the steps she has taken to improve the quality and timeliness of EU interventions in seeking to assist the poorest countries. [64692]

Clare Short: My Department's detailed proposals to improve the quality, effectiveness and poverty focus of EC aid have been set out in strategy papers published in December 1998 and August 2001.

Development

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the purposes for which the United Kingdom's annual contributions to the International Development Association are used. [64694]

Clare Short: Under the last three year replenishment, the UK contributed 7.3 per cent. of new donor resources for the International Development Association (IDA)—the aim of the World bank providing concessional finance to the poorest countries.

The World bank's annual report 2001 details the use of IDA funds by country, region and sector. This report will be available in the Library of the House.

Globalisation

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the progress of her proposals for managing the process of globalisation in a way that increases opportunities for the world's poor. [64701]

Clare Short: The second White Paper on International Development sets out an agenda for managing globalisation to ensure that poor people are able to share in its benefits. The White Paper sets out long term commitments for how the Government will contribute to achieving the Millennium Development Goals.

Report on progress is contained in DFID annual reports.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

English Heritage

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the role of English Heritage in planning applications. [66516]

Mr. McNulty: English Heritage is a non-Departmental Public Body responsible for advising the Government on all aspects of the built heritage in England. It has a statutory role as consultee in certain planning and other heritage casework. This role is set out in the Town and Country Planning (General Development Procedure) Order 1995 and the joint DETR/DCMS Circular 01/2001.

Ordnance Survey

Norman Baker: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister under what circumstances Ordnance Survey is permitted deliberately to omit information from OS maps; who is empowered to require this; and if he will make a statement. [65165]

Mr. McNulty: Ordnance Survey works within the guidelines of a Sensitive Site Register and discusses with the owners of the properties on the register the detail which can be shown on our mapping.

Beacon Status

John Austin: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he will invite councils to apply for beacon status in the fourth round of the scheme. [66798]

Mr. Raynsford: We will publish an application brochure shortly, inviting councils to apply by 26 September 2002. Copies of the brochure will be placed in the Library of the House.

Health and Safety

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his departmental responsibility for setting health and safety standards for new building works and on their implementation by the Health and Safety Executive. [63707]

Mr. Leslie: The health and safety standards which must be achieved by new building works are set by the Building Regulations and are the responsibility of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. These standards are enforced by local authority building control officers. The Health and Safety Executive, responsibility for which now resides with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, enforces the separate legislation protecting the health and safety of workers and the public from risks arising during construction work.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Clarence House

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what her estimate is of the cost of refurbishment of Clarence House; and how it will be funded. [62349]

Dr. Howells: Detailed surveys are currently taking place to ascertain the extent of the Clarence House refurbishment works, which include work on fire compartmentation, automatic fire detection, upgrade of electrical and mechanical services and some redecoration. It is not possible to provide a firm estimate of the cost of the refurbishment until the completion of these surveys. The refurbishment will be funded from the current level of grant in aid for the maintenance of the Occupied Royal Palaces.

Royal Palaces

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what profit has been made from admission charges to (a) Windsor Castle and (b) Buckingham Palace in each year since 1992. [62350]

Dr. Howells: The net surplus from admission charges to Windsor Castle and Buckingham Palace for the years requested[1] are presented in the following tables:

[1] Figures for 2001–02 not available.

Windsor Castle—year ended 31 March

1993–94	100
1994–95	1,605
1995–96	1,908

1996–97	1,630
1997–98	1,023
1998–99	996
1999–2000	782
2000–01	604

Queen Mother

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport whether special payments were made to Westminster City council to offset the costs it incurred in preparing for the funeral of Her Majesty the Queen Mother. [65590]

Dr. Howells: Costs incurred by Westminster City council in preparing the processional route for the funeral of Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother will be met by the Government. They will shortly submit their claim to the Department for approval.

Interior and Garden Design

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate she has made of the contribution to the UK economy of British interior and garden design in the last 12 months. [64491]

Dr. Howells: Responsibility for the sponsorship of design rests with the Department of Trade and Industry. The Creative Industries Mapping Document 2001, published by my Department in March 2001, estimated that the size of design related activity within the UK economy as a whole at £26.7 billion. No separate estimates were made for interior and garden design.

Royal Parks Agency

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions she has had with the Royal Parks Agency concerning the pay award to employees for April 2001–02 formalised in September 2001. [64671]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had no discussions with the Royal Parks Agency concerning the pay award to employees for 2001–02. I understand that the Royal Parks management and the trade unions are currently discussing the 2001–02 pay award.

Television Licences

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she expects to introduce measures to preserve the rights of beneficiaries of the Accommodation for Residential Care concessionary television licence scheme when the (a) social mix and (b) level of warden cover in their sheltered housing changes. [64743]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Consultations between officials and the BBC about the necessary amendments to the television licence fee regulations to introduce the proposed changes are currently under way. We intend to bring forward these amendments as soon as we can, but it is important that in doing so we do not create any new anomalies or unnecessary administrative burdens.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many households are entitled to free TV licences in Portsmouth; and if she will make a statement. [65376]

Dr. Howells: TV Licensing, which administers the free television licence scheme for the BBC as Licensing Authority, is not able to provide geographical breakdowns of the number of free licences issued. However, estimates based on the 1991 Census indicate that there were approximately 14,600 people aged 75 or over in Portsmouth.

Radio Stations

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment she has made of the start up costs for access radio stations. [65109]

Dr. Howells: The Radio Authority has appointed a consultant to carry out an independent evaluation looking at a number of issues including start-up and on-going costs for each station. The Radio Authority's report will be sent to the Secretary of State early next year.

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent discussions she has had with representatives of small independent local radio stations on accessibility to digital radio multiplexes; and if she will make a statement. [65117]

Dr. Howells: None.

Film Classification

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the British Board of Film Classification is able to change the criteria against which it determines classification of films. [64374]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 27 June 2002]: Yes. The British Board of Film Classification is an independent body. The guidelines it has established reflect the law, but they also take into account public consultation and research, and are reviewed periodically to reflect changes in public tastes, attitudes and concerns.

Public Inquiries

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what her policy is on using 0870 telephone numbers for inquiries by the public to the Department and its agencies. [66202]

Dr. Howells: My Department does not currently use 0870 telephone numbers to handle public inquiries or for any other purpose.

Digital Television

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on the different standards of definition used in digital television broadcasting. [65458]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 1 July 2002]: Standards for definition used in broadcasting are set out in the Independent Television Commission's Community Digital Standards, which are to be adopted by all licenced services. These can be found at http://www.itc.org.uk/itcpublications/codesguidance/DigitalCommunityStandards/ The BBC follow the specifications agreed by broadcasters in the D-book issued by the Digital Television Group.

OFCOM

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on progress in appointing a Chairman of Ofcom. [65464]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 1 July 2002]: Advertisements for the position of Chairman of OFCOM have appeared in the national press and newspapers in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. A panel, including two independent members, will interview short-listed candidates shortly and we hope to announce the name of the successful person towards the end of July or early in August.

National Lottery

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what guidelines have been put in place by the Secretary of State to guarantee that lottery money distributors transfer funds to grant recipients as quickly as possible; and what measures are in place to monitor the efficacy of these guidelines. [65599]

Mr. Caborn: While the Government wishes to see Lottery funds benefit individuals and communities as quickly as possible, Financial Directions to Lottery distributing bodies do prevent them from drawing down money from the National Lottery Distribution Fund until that money is needed to meet the costs and expenditure incurred by grant recipients.

We have asked distributors to explore fully what they can do, within their existing financial directions, to transfer committed funds more quickly to grant recipients. We are also considering, with distributors, how the financial directions might be amended to accelerate the transfer of committed funds, and whether any amendments might usefully be supplemented by guidance from my Department.

Recycling

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proportion of (a) paper and (b) other goods purchased by her Department was recycled paper in each year since 1997; what the annual total cost of these purchases was; what plans there are to increase these proportions; and if she will make a statement. [65765]

Dr. Howells: All paper purchased for use in photocopiers, printers and Fax machines is recycled paper. Where the quality of the end product allows, all print orders also specify recycled paper is to be used. Paper is purchased as part of general stationery and that commodity before 2000–2001 was not recorded as a separate cost. In year 2000–2001 expenditure on paper was £27,450. In it 2001–2002 it was £29,363. The DCMS has in place, an Environmental Management System, one aspect of which is sustainable procurement, and central to which is the requirement for continuous improvement in environmental performance.

Swimming Pools

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many (a) indoor and (b) outdoor Olympic standard swimming pools there are in England. [65466]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 1 July 2002]: We have contacted Sport England to request this information and I will write to the hon. Member as soon as it is available, placing copies of my letter in the Libraries of both Houses.

School Sport

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she will implement plans to invest in school sports as announced by the Prime Minister on 11 January 2001 and 9 June. [65598]

Mr. Caborn: DCMS/DfES are working together to deliver the PE school sport and club links project outlined by the PM in his announcements. Already 1.8 million primary pupils are benefiting from our investment in the school sports coordinators (SSCo) programme. Where SSCo partnerships have been established, pupils are enjoying increased: extra-curricular provision; opportunities for competitive sport; links with secondary schools easing the transition between Key Stages Two and Three; access to qualified sports coaches; and opportunities to access training in sports leadership. By September this year there will be 142 specialist sports colleges supporting 742 SSCos and 3,576 primary link teachers. SSCOs will be key in delivering the entitlement for all 5 to 16-year-olds to two hours a week of high quality school sport and physical education within and beyond the curriculum. We will extend the SSCo programme to reach all primary pupils by 2006 (subject to spending review decisions).

Tennis Courts

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many (a) indoor, (b) outdoor with lighting and (c) outdoor without lighting tennis courts there are in England. [65465]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 1 July 2002]: We have contacted Sport England to request the information, and I will write to the hon. Member as soon as it is available, placing copies of my letter in the Libraries of both Houses.

PFI Projects

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport which PFI projects fall under the responsibility of the Department's NDPBs. [65070]

Dr. Howells: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave her on 10 June 2002, Official Report, columns 1014–15W, which refers to the PFI projects under the responsibility of the Department's NDPBs.

Tourism

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if she will make a statement on the impact on the English Tourism Council of her plans to change the marketing of tourism in England; [65457]

(2) what effect her plans to change the marketing of tourism in England would have on visitengland.org.uk; [65454]

(3) if she will make a statement on her plans to change the marketing of tourism in England; and what progress has been made; [65462]

(4) if she will make a statement on the long-term future of the English Tourism Council; [65456]

(5) if her plans to change the marketing of tourism in England would transfer functions of the English Tourism Council to (a) her Department, (b) the regional tourist boards, (c) the regional development agencies and (d) other companies or organisations; [65455]

(6) if she will list those who were consulted about her plans to change the marketing of tourism in England prior to their announcement; [65461]

(7) if she will make a statement on the marketing of tourism in England. [65453]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 1 July 2002]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's announcement on 13 May of a programme of modernisation and radical change followed a full day seminar in October 2001, discussion at the Tourism Summit of Ministers in March 2002 and a Tourism Forum meeting in April 2002. In addition, there has been close consultation with Alan Britten (chairman of the English Tourism Council) and with chairs of regional development agencies as well as informal discussion with many people in the tourism industry over the last year.

Since that announcement, good progress has been made in developing plans for the domestic marketing of English tourism. I have chaired two meetings of a small steering group, comprising senior representatives of the English Tourism Council, British Tourist Authority, Tourism Alliance, regional development agencies, regional tourist boards, Local Government Association and the private sector. We have considered a model for public-private coalition for domestic marketing and made an initial assessment of priorities for strategic delivery of other support to the industry, including considering the roles to be played by the regional development agencies, regional tourist boards and local government.

In due course, we will make a further statement on the marketing of English tourism within the UK, a role which is not currently carried out at national level. However, the events of 2001 illustrated its huge potential and we intend to respond to that opportunity, since it will increase the long-term growth potential and sustainability of the industry. The industry is fully in support of this strategic change and key areas that the new organisation (a radically reformed English Tourism Council) is likely to consider are: the development of a national marketing strategy (including e-tourism and the usefulness and appropriateness of websites such as visitengland.org.uk); thematic marketing of England within the UK along the lines of what the British Tourist Authority does successfully abroad; engagement of the private sector (including match funding); and more efficient coordination of the huge expenditure on tourism marketing that already takes place at regional, sub-regional and local level.

The English Tourism Council has worked effectively to take forward much of what was set out in the Government's 1999 strategy, Tomorrow's Tourism; it has also engaged the regional tourist boards to work efficiently together, including piloting new ideas and disseminating the results of those projects. I am pleased with this progress and we now want to increase the emphasis on delivery and results. The regional development agencies are best placed, working in partnership with the regional tourist boards, to do much of this. Accordingly, we will radically change the English Tourism Council into a body that focuses on marketing and associated activities such as e-tourism and relevant research. We have not yet decided on any transfer of functions to the bodies referred to in the question and no changes are planned to visitengland.org.uk. We will make a fuller announcement once we have completed our deliberations.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Retail Crime

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the annual cost of retail crime to (a) business, (b) local authorities and (c) the police has been in the past three years. [54564]

Mr. Denham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Weston-Super-Mare (Brian Cotter) on 14 May 2002, Official Report, column 606W.

European Legislation

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 13 March 2002, Official Report, column 1100W, on European Documents, if he will make a statement on the nature of legislation under discussion in the fields of (a) visa policy, (b) information exchange and analysis, (c) pre-frontier measures, (d) border management, (e) improvement and co-ordination at operational level, (f) work of Europol and (g) aliens and criminals law and readmission and return. [57887]

Beverley Hughes: The Action Plan on illegal immigration was adopted at the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 28 February 2002. Measures within the plan are to be implemented in the short and medium term, with short-term measures to be implemented as soon as possible and in principle within one year of adoption of the Action Plan. Outlined below are the short term measures—both legislative and operative—in the six areas of the plan:

Visa policy

To improve document security on the basis of new technologies.

To run a pilot project on using joint infrastructures and to strengthen consular co-operation.

To conduct a feasibility study to determine the main features of the common visa identification system.

Information Exchange and Analysis

To draft an annual report consisting of a statistical overview and data analysis.

To conduct a feasibility study with a view to developing a European system for exchanging information.

To implement and appraise the existing Early Warning System.

Pre-frontier Measures

To step up co-operation via the liaison officer network.

To continue to implement the action of the High Level Working Group on Asylum and Migration.

Measures relating to Border Management

To put into practice a risk assessment.

To conduct a feasibility study on improving sea border controls.

To analyse the possible contribution from police college (CEPOL) towards improving training.

To step up co-operation with the operational services in the member states.

To analyse the feasibility of a joint external borders service.

Readmission and Return Policy

To improve practical co-operation between the competent services.

To determine appropriate criteria and practical arrangements for the compensation between member states of costs resulting from the enforcement of expulsion decisions.

To analyse the actions and measures that may be envisaged on the basis of the Commission's Green Paper on return.

To conclude outstanding readmission agreements with third countries.

To further identify third countries with which readmission agreements need to be negotiated.

To establish standards for the transit of returnees.

Europol

No short term measures.

Penalties

To put into practise the new Community instruments aimed at combating illegal trafficking of human beings.

To determine the possibility of granting certain benefits/assistance to victims of trafficking of human beings.

To conduct a study of the laws of the member states.

To analyse the possibility of adopting provisions on confiscation of financial gains and on confiscation of means, in particular means of transport used in criminal activities relating to illegal immigration.

To consider follow up to the Directive on carrier liability.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he will reply to the letter to him dated 18 March from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Afghan asylum-seeker ref DEV/00/1506; [61681]

(2) when he will reply to the letter to him dated 25 April from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mrs. Amina Mdalem Fadem; [61685]

(3) when he will reply to the letter to him dated 22 April from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. Ahmad Rezal. [61683]

Mr. Blunkett: I wrote to my right hon. Friend on 1 July 2002.

Social Exclusion

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the level of social exclusion in the city of Newport; and how his recently announced programme will measure a change in social exclusion. [63336]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 20 June 2002]: The Newport Community Safety Partnership undertook a very thorough audit of crime and disorder in the city which informed their 'Strategy to Reduce Crime and Disorder in Newport 2002–05', which I launched publicly on 17 June 2002. Many people and groups were consulted during the audit process including councillors, MPs, interest groups and minority groups.

The new strategy provides not only a clear direction for combating crime and disorder, but also addresses social inclusion issues. The strategy sets out clear objectives, performance indicators and targets for its key aims and progress against these will be the measure of its effectiveness. The strategy aims to: encourage good citizenship among young people; reduce the number of violent crimes; reduce the level of property crime; reduce the impact of drugs and alcohol and make Newport a safer place. Change will also be evinced by the Welsh Assembly Government's own social inclusion programme, which includes the Communities First initiative.

Serious Fraud Office

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the Director of the Serious Fraud Office. [64229]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: My right hon. Friend, the Home Secretary, has not had any meetings with the Director of the Serious Fraud Office since he became Home Secretary. However, the Home Department maintains close relations with the Serious Fraud Office and I attended an inter-departmental meeting on his behalf on 10 June at which the Director, Rosalind Wright, was also present.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met (a) the Director of Public Prosecutions, (b) the President of the Law Society and (c) the Chairman of the Bar; where he has advertised the post of Director-General of IND; when he will appoint the Director-General of IND; and how many civil servants are employed in IND. [64230]

Beverley Hughes: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary (Mr. Blunkett) last met the Director of Public Prosecutions on 10 June 2002 and the Chairman of the Bar Council on 8 March 2002. The Secretary of State has not yet met the current President of the Law Society.

The post of Director-General of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) was advertised in the media as follows:

21 April 2002—The Sunday Times Public
22 April 2002—The Voice
23 April 2002—Ethnic Media Group
24 April 2002—The Guardian
25 April 2002—The Times (repeated from the Sunday Times).

It is expected that an announcement about the appointment of a new Director-General of IND will be made during July.

There are 11,253 civil servants employed by IND.

Animal Research

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what assessment he has made of the reporting of the methods used in research on primates at Cambridge University; [64259]

(2) what assessment he has made of progress made in research on primates at Cambridge University in the past five years; [64258]

(3) what investigation he has made of non-animal alternatives to the research on marmoset brain research at Cambridge University; [64256]

(4) what plans he has to review research into primates at Cambridge University; [64260]

(5) what factors he took into account in assessing marmoset brain research at Cambridge University in order to evaluate (a) the potential benefits to be derived from the research and (b) the suffering likely to be experienced by the marmosets; [64254]

(6) what assessment he has made of (a) the housing conditions and (b) the post-operative care of marmosets involved in research at Cambridge University; [64257]

(7) if he will refer the research into primates at Cambridge University to the Animal Procedures Committee; [64261]

(8) what factors informed his decision to give each of the project licences for marmoset brain research at Cambridge University a moderate severity band. [64255]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: We have received a copy of a report of an investigation carried out by the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection into primate research at Cambridge university, and we are in the process of giving it careful consideration.

As part of that, the Chief Inspector of the Animal (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate has been commissioned to report on the documentation, analysis and advice underpinning the original severity limits and severity bands on the relevant project licences. In addition he will advise on whether the licensing decisions were sound and defensible, and will review compliance with the relevant licence authorities.

The Animals Procedure Committee (APC) may advise the Secretary of State about any issues relating to the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. The APC has been made aware of the concerns recently raised about the research in question, but the Secretary of State does not plan at this stage to refer the matter to the Committee, pending receipt of the Chief Inspector's report.

The general factors taken into account in assessing the applications for licences to conduct the research are as set out in the Guidance on the Operation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, and in the Chief Inspector's paper on the cost/benefit assessment published as part of the Animal Procedures Committee annual report of 1997 (both are available in the Library). In determining whether and on what terms to grant a project licence, section 5 (4) of the 1986 Act requires that the likely adverse effect on the animals concerned must be weighed against the benefit likely to accrue as a result of the programme specified in the licence.

The severity bands assigned were determined according to the principles set out in the relevant sections of the Home Office Guidance on the Operation of the 1986 Act. The assessment of the severity band for the project as a whole reflects the number of animals used on each protocol and actual suffering likely to be caused as result. It is based on the overall level of cumulative suffering to be experienced by each animal, not just the worst possible case. It takes into account the proportion of animals expected to reach the severity limit of the protocol and the duration of the exposure to that severity limit, the nature and intensity of the adverse effects, and the actions taken to relieve the suffering. Professional judgment must be applied by the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate (ASPI) on a case-by-case basis.

Under the provisions of the 1986 Act, animals can only be used in scientific procedures when there is no alternative way to achieve the objective concerned, such as using computer models, cell cultures and other in vitro methods. This condition applies to the research conducted at Cambridge university and (ASPI) challenged, verified and advised this is the case. ASPI is composed of medical and veterinary graduates with a wide range of experience and expertise in the biomedical sciences, including research methods not involving the use of living animals. All establishments designated under the 1986 Act are required to provide standards of care and accommodation complying with the provisions of the Home Office Code of Practice for the Housing and Care of Animals used in Scientific Procedures. This is required through conditions of issue attached to the Certificates of Designation and is monitored through the inspection programme. The required standards of post-operative care in this case were prescribed through the terms and conditions of the relevant certificate of designation, project licence and personal licences.

Progress and conduct of the research has been monitored by ASPI in the normal way through announced and unannounced inspections, supplementary information obtained when licence amendments were sought, and from publications resulting from the programme of work.

We will consider what further action may be appropriate when we have received the Chief Inspector's report.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals in 2001 will be published. [64742]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth [holding answer 23 June 2002]: It is expected that these statistics will be published in the second half of July 2002.

Yarl's Wood

Mr. Patrick Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many detainees who were present at Yarl's Wood Immigration Detention Centre on the evening of 14 February had been removed from Britain as of Tuesday 21 May. [59254]

Beverley Hughes: Information about the number of detainees who have been removed is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost by an examination of individual case files.

CRE (Annual Report)

Mike Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to make available the Commission for Racial Equality 2001 annual report. [66703]

Mr. Blunkett: The Commission for Racial Equality's Annual Report 2001 is published today.

I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library and for copies to be sent to the Scottish Parliament and the National Assembly for Wales.

Police

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what influence the funders of the British Transport police have over its policies, operational matters and personnel; and if he will make a statement. [66446]

Mr. Jamieson: I have been asked to reply.

The duties and responsibilities regarding the organisation, control and governance of the BTP are set out in the British Transport Police Force Scheme ("the scheme"). The current text of the scheme can be found in the Schedule to Statutory Instrument 1994–609. The scheme provides that the British Transport police (BTP) is under the direction and control of the chief constable. The chief constable, who is appointed by the BTP Committee, is responsible for the administration of the BTP in accordance with the directions given to him by the BTP Committee.

The scheme provides that it shall be a duty of the BTP Committee to, among other things:

(i) supervise the administration of the force by the chief constable on such lines as it may from time to time determine, following consultation with the SRA and others, to give him such directions as may from time to time be necessary for that purpose;

(ii) secure the maintenance of an adequate and efficient police service by the force;

(iii) determine the number of persons of each rank in the force; and

(iv) provide and maintain such buildings, structures, premises, vehicles, apparatus, clothing and other equipment as may be required for the purposes of the force.

The scheme also prescribes the composition of the BTP Committee, which is currently nine members including the chairman. The scheme provides that the BTP Committee shall consist of a chairman appointed by the Strategic Rail Authority (SRA), not more than six other members appointed by the SRA and one member each appointed by the operator of the national rail network and London Regional Transport. The scheme further provides that among the six SRA appointed members certain interests must be represented. These are:

at least one member who has wide experience of, or who has shown capacity in, the control or administration of police; and a member appointed after consultation with the Rail Passengers' Committee and who has wide experience of the interests and concerns of users of railway services and facilities.

In addition to these two specified required representatives, the SRA has currently appointed two independent members and two representatives of the train operating companies.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Certified Timber

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the refurbishment projects that (a) are in progress and (b) will start within the next six months; and what action is being taken to ensure that these will procure certified timber. [59762]

Jane Kennedy: The refurbishment projects currently being completed or due to start within the Northern Ireland Office are as follows:

Compensation Agency—Refurbishing new accommodation for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Appeals Panel. In progress.

Criminal Justice Division—Refurbishment work at Rathgael. In progress.

Criminal Justice Division—Refurbishment of new offices for the Youth Justice Agency. Likely to start within the next eight weeks.

Refurbishment contracts are procured for the Northern Ireland Office by the Department of Finance and Personnel Construction Service. No reference is made to the use of certified timber in any contract documents or specifications given to contractors.

Performance Targets

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the (a) cost and (b) saving from the pursuit of the Department's Public Service Agreement targets in each year since they were introduced. [61044]

Jane Kennedy: The NIO's Public Service Agreement (PSA) was first published in October 2000 to cover the three-year period 2001–02 to 2003–04. As the PSA targets effectively embrace virtually all of our departmental activities, the cost of seeking to meet our PSA objectives is essentially the same as our total departmental expenditure. For 2001–02 (the first year of our PSA) this is currently estimated at £1.052 billion.

The efficiency elements within our current PSA are already reflected in the profiling of the budget set for the Department whereby anticipated reductions in spending in one area are redirected to offset emerging pressures in other areas.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Television Monitors

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what the estimated number of television monitors on the parliamentary estate is. [65727]

Mrs. Roe: It is estimated that there are 2,300 television monitors on the Parliamentary Estate.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Ministerial Salaries

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the annual cost was of ministerial salaries in his Department in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 2001–02. [60934]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The level of ministerial salaries is recommended by the Senior Salaries Review Body. From May 1997, there were at the FCO one Cabinet Minister, at an annual salary cost of £43,991; three Ministers of State, at annual salaries totalling £114,088; and two Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, at annual salaries totalling £67,255. Since June 2001, the FCO has had one Cabinet Minister, at an annual salary cost of £68,157; three Ministers of State, at annual salaries totalling £140,995; and two Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, at annual salaries totalling £87,796.

Those Ministers who are Members of the House of Commons also receive the full parliamentary salary, in recognition of their continuing constituency duties.

Afghanistan

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many prisoners were taken during coalition operations in Afghanistan; and how many of these are thought to be Chechen. [64455]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We do not hold the information requested which would need to take into account prisoners taken by British forces as well as other coalition partners.

Liberia (Timber Trade)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the UK Government will support the extension of the United Nations sanction against Liberia to cover the Liberian timber trade; and if he will make a statement. [64354]

Mr. MacShane: The UK supports UN Security Council resolution (UNSCR) 1408 (2002), which calls on Liberia to establish a transparent and internationally verifiable audit regime to ensure that revenue derived from the Liberian timber industry is used for legitimate social, humanitarian and development purposes, and not for purchasing arms.

EU Directives

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the EU directives and regulations that have been implemented through his Department in 2002; and what was the cost of each to public funds. [64970]

Peter Hain: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office plays a co-ordinating role in the United Kingdom's EU policy, and so rarely implements EU directives. Regulations are directly applicable in the member states without the need for further incorporation into national law.

I am not aware of any directives on which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has led on implementation this year.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the EU directives relating to his Department which have been (a) amended and (b) repealed in 2002. [64950]

Peter Hain: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office plays a co-ordinating role in the United Kingdom's EU policy, and so rarely leads on the amendment or repeal of EU directives and regulations.

I am not aware of the amendment or repeal of any directives or regulations on which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has led this year.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many statutory instruments have been (a) introduced, (b) removed and (c) amended by his Department since 1 January; and what the (i) cost and (ii) saving has been in each case. [64637]

Mr. Straw: A list of statutory instruments which have originated from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office since January 2002 are listed as follows. To provide an assessment would incur disproportionate costs.

As from 1 March 2002 explanatory memorandums have been provided for all affirmative instruments as announced by the Leader of the House on Friday 1 February 2002.

S.I. title	Number
The Territorial Sea Act 1987 (Jersey) (Amendment) Order 2002	2002/250

The Geneva Conventions (Amendments) Act (Overseas Territories) Order 2002	2002/1076
British Nationality the British Overseas Territories Act 2002 (Commencement) Order 2002	2002/1752 (c.34)
The Consular Fees Act 1980 (Fees) Order 2002	2002/1618

Annual Leave

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the average annual leave entitlement is for staff in his Department in 2002. [64646]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given him by the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) on 6 February 2002, Official Report, column 950W. Leave entitlements have not changed since then. Average leave entitlements could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Nuba Mountains Ceasefire

Mr. Alan Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the effectiveness of the Nuba Mountains ceasefire agreement; and if he will make a statement. [64807]

Mr. MacShane: The Nuba Mountains ceasefire agreement is working well. Both the Government of Sudan and the SPLM/A have participated fully in the Joint Military Commission. This has resulted in redeployment of Government troops out of the relevant sectors and of the SPLM/A forces into agreed positions. Humanitarian assistance is being delivered to a region to which access had been denied for a considerable period. The population of the area now enjoys freedom of movement and the ability to cultivate on a wider scale than has proved possible in recent years. The agreement runs out next month. We hope that the ceasefire will be extended and have called on the parties to agree to this outcome.

Sudan

Mr. Alan Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff in the unit headed by the Special Representative to Sudan are (a) his Department's staff and (b) DFID staff; and what proportion, in (i) cash and (ii) percentage terms, of the budget of the office is provided by his Department. [64806]

Mr. MacShane: The Sudan Unit's full-time complement is currently one DFID and three FCO officials. This is in addition to the UK Special Representative and the part-time legal adviser. The unit's staff costs are paid by the officers' parent Departments. The unit can also make recommendations about the use of FCO and DFID programme funds in support of peace, human rights and humanitarian assistance.

Mr. Alan Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the (a) dates and (b) venues of meetings between the Sudanese ambassador in London and Ministers in his Department in (a) April, (b) May and (c) June. [64808]

Mr. MacShane: The Sudanese ambassador accompanied the Sudanese presidential peace adviser when he met my noble Friend Baroness Amos at the FCO on 7 May.

United Nations Commission on Human Rights

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason Her Majesty's Government's representative on the United Nations Commission on Human Rights abstained on resolution 2002–11, passed on 2 June. [64958]

Mr. MacShane: The resolution, dated 19 April and sponsored by the African Group, proposed termination of the mandate of the UN Special Representative on Equatorial Guinea. The EU unsuccessfully proposed an amendment to permit continuation of a monitoring mechanism. The EU decided by consensus to abstain on the resolution, together with its associates, Canada, Japan, Republic of Korea, most of the Latin American and Caribbean countries. In our statement we expressed deep disappointment at the African Group's refusal to negotiate on the text of the resolution, appreciation for the work of the UN Special Representative, profound concern over human rights violations in Equatorial Guinea, and deep regret at the absence of any monitoring mechanism.

The EU remains concerned at human rights violations in Equatorial Guinea. In the context of the recent trials of alleged coup plotters, the EU issued a Declaration urging the Government to respect their rights.

Political Union

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's understanding of the meaning of the phrase "political union" in the Laeken declaration; and if he will cite the previous occurrences of that phrase in documents agreed upon by the European Council. [64704]

Peter Hain: The term "political union" has been used at several European Councils to describe the unique political relationship that exists between members of the European Union, as set out in the European treaties. It has no formal definition, accepted by all, whether in Council meetings or elsewhere.

The term has appeared in a number of documents agreed by the European Council in the past: annexe 1 of the presidency conclusions of the Vienna European Council 11–12 December 1998; and in conclusions to the Dublin, Rome and Maastricht European Councils in April and December 1990 and December 1991 respectively.

Western Sahara

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his EU colleagues regarding the referendum plan for western Sahara; and if he will make a statement. [64598]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: UK officials are in regular contact with our EU colleagues. We continue to support the efforts of the UN in trying to find a just and durable resolution to the western Sahara dispute.

Turkey

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Turkish Government regarding the treatment of members of the Kurdish Rights and Freedom party in (a) Dujaibakin and (b) other cities. [64605]

Peter Hain: On 19–20 June, a senior official from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office led a UK delegation at the first formal UK/Turkey Human Rights Dialogue, in Ankara. There was a frank and constructive discussion of the human rights situation in Turkey, the measures recently taken to improve it and what remains to be done to ensure the rights of all, including the Kurds.

Morocco

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Morocco regarding their treatment of mourners at the funeral of Fadel Ismail. [64599]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have not received any reports of a Moroccan presence at Fadel Ismail's funeral, which took place near Tindouf in Algeria. There were reports of some disturbance at events in western Sahara after the funeral.

As neither representatives of Mr. Ismail's family nor the Polisario nor the Algerian Government raised this matter with us, we have made no representations to the Government of Morocco regarding their treatment of mourners at the funeral of Fadel Ismail.

Seville

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the size was of the delegation from the UK for the European Council meeting in Seville. [64821]

Peter Hain: The delegation from the UK comprised 18 from No. 10 and the Cabinet Office (including the Prime Minister); 13 from the FCO (including the Foreign Secretary and me); one HM Treasury; and nine security staff.

Taiwan

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support he has provided to the Government of Taiwan in support of Taiwan's application for observer status at the World Health Organisation. [65217]

Mr. MacShane: Taiwan's relationship to the World Health Organisation was discussed at the World Health Assembly General Committee in May 2002. There was no consensus in the committee for the matter to be discussed in the main assembly session and the matter did not come to a vote.

Belarus

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he will make to the Belarusian Government concerning the convictions of Mikola Markevich and Pavel Mazheiko for libelling the President; what further action he has planned to ensure that human rights are respected in this case; what action the European Union will be taking; and if he will make a statement. [65386]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The court decision to sentence Nikolai Markevich and Pavel Mozheiko to "restricted freedom" for defaming President Lukashenko is the latest example of the disregard for international standards of human rights in Belarus. Our ambassador at Minsk has already made clear our concerns about the case during informal discussions with the authorities there.

Representatives from our embassy in Minsk have, together with other like-minded partners (including from the EU, US & OSCE missions) regularly attended the trial. Both defendants have expressed their gratitude for this support, and made it clear that they believed it played a significant part in their not being sentenced to full custodial terms. Both of those concerned are expected to lodge an appeal in the next few days.

Our embassy in Minsk will continue to monitor the case closely, and we shall continue to consult with our EU and other partners.

Business Ambassadors

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria he adopts in his appointment of business ambassadors. [65367]

Mr. MacShane: The ambassadors for British business are selected to represent a wide cross-section of British commercial success. They are people who frequently go abroad on working visits and have a wealth of specialist knowledge backed up by excellent contacts. They include the chairmen and executives of multinationals as well as smaller concerns.

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 21 June 2002, Official Report, column 637W, how many official visits each business ambassador has undertaken, on what date and to which countries. [65366]

Mr. MacShane: I will write to my hon. Friend with these details, and copies will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Green Minister

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs who his Department's Green Minister is; when they (a) have attended and (b) plan to attend meetings of the Green Ministers' Committee; what the outcomes of meetings were for his Department's activities; and if he will make a statement. [65981]

Mr. MacShane: I am the FCO's Green Minister and attended meetings of the Cabinet sub-committee in February and March this year. I will attend future meetings whenever possible. The committee has helped the FCO and other Departments to consider how Government policies can best contribute to sustainable development.

World Service

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions his officials have had with HM Treasury as part of the spending review with regard to funding for the BBC World Service. [65753]

Mr. MacShane: The BBC World Service's bid was submitted in February to HM Treasury in full, as part of the FCO's bid for additional funding in the Spending Review. Since then, my officials have been actively discussing the merits of the FCO's bid, including the BBC World Service, with Treasury officials. The BBC World Service has also made its own presentation to Treasury.

EU Enlargement

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent assessment the Government have made of the effect of the membership in the European Union of (a) Poland, (b) The Czech Republic, (c) Slovakia, (d) Estonia, (e) Latvia, (f) Lithuania, (g) Hungary, (h) Slovenia, (i) Cyprus and (j) Malta on the European Union's budget. [65710]

Peter Hain: The Berlin European Council (March 1999) set a ceiling of 35 billion euro in payments for new member states for 2004–06. Based on its proposals for phasing in EU policies to new member states, the Commission estimates the cost to the EU budget of up to ten new member states acceding in 2004 to be 28 billion euro for the period 2004–06. This can be financed well within the ceiling on Own Resources (which will remain at 1.27 per cent. of GNP). The Commission's proposals remain the subject of negotiation and no estimate of the cost for individual applicants is given. The Government's view is that the final package must respect the overall financial ceilings agreed at Berlin.

Gibraltar

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the results of his discussions on Gibraltar with the Spanish Foreign Secretary on 26 June; what deadline exists for the negotiations with Spain on the future of Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement. [65711]

Peter Hain: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and the Spanish Foreign Minister met informally in London on 26 June to continue discussions on Gibraltar. They had a friendly and constructive exchange of views. They agreed that we have made good progress since talks were restarted last year. The two Governments have found a considerable degree of consensus. They underlined their belief that it is sensible and right and in the interests of Britain, Spain and the people of Gibraltar to make this effort to resolve the dispute. They agreed to convene a formal Brussels Process meeting on 12 July in Madrid.

UK-USA Security Agreement

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the (a) purpose and (b) accountability of the 1948 UK-USA security agreement. [65155]

Mr. Straw: It is a long-standing practice of this Government and previous Administrations not to comment on the detail of confidential arrangements which might exist between the UK and the US for the UK's national security.

MI6

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what mechanism exists to ensure that the exchange of information undertaken between (a) MI6 and (b) GCHQ and sister organisations within friendly countries, and to which Ministers do not have access, is conducted in a manner consistent with the national interest. [65159]

Mr. Straw: Both SIS and GCHQ carry out their functions under the Intelligence Services Act (ISA) 1994. Section 2(2) and 4(2) of the ISA require that the Chief of the SIS and the Director of GCHQ put in place arrangements for ensuring that no information is obtained by SIS or GCHQ respectively and disclosed by them except in the interests of national security; for the purposes of the prevention and detection of serious crime; in the interests of economic well-being of the UK; or for the purpose of any criminal proceedings. The arrangements must also ensure that GCHQ and SIS do not take any action to further the interests of any United Kingdom political party. I am satisfied that the arrangements are in place to meet those requirements.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Exhibitions and Seminars Abroad Scheme

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes her Department plans to make in the support for the Exhibitions and Seminars Abroad Scheme. [60769]

Ms Hewitt: A review of certain rules and procedures for the Exhibitions and Seminars Abroad (SESA) Scheme was concluded in March this year. This put forward a number of options for change which were subsequently refined into a set of recommendations. A wider ranging review of the needs of British Trade International's customers is currently under way. This is a strategic review to develop a simpler, more coherent and effective portfolio of services and it is sensible that the outcome of the work on SESA should now feed into this wider review. We shall not therefore be making significant changes to the SESA terms and conditions at this time, although one change is being made. This is the removal of the requirement for a minimum group size when groups of companies attend events with SESA support and therefore the removal of the need for a separate "niche" category for support.

Departmental Grants

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which organisations and outside bodies which were in receipt of grant in 1997–98 no longer are; what the annual saving is (i) individually and (ii) in aggregate; which organisations and outside bodies which were not in receipt of grant in 1997–98 now are; and what the annual cost is (A) individually and (B) in aggregate. [62247]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend, the Chief Secretary on 17 June 2002, Official Report, columns 136–37W.

Western Sahara

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice is given to United Kingdom companies wishing to operate in western Sahara. [64604]

Ms Hewitt: The British embassies in Rabat and Algiers are able to offer appropriate advice on a case-by-case basis to UK companies wishing to operate in western Sahara. More generally we advise companies wishing to operate in that territory to seek the advice and agreement of both parties to the dispute (the Moroccans and the Algerians/Polisario, who are all represented in London) as part of their business planning.

Carbon Emissions

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the (a) current total annual carbon emissions and (b) expected total annual emissions from installed capacity for all projects in the power sector fuelled by coal, oil or gas that have received assistance from the ECGD are since 1997. [65193]

Ms Hewitt: Since ECGD does not have readily available information on the completion dates and operating schedules of all the power projects that the Department has supported, it is not possible easily to calculate actual total carbon emissions since 1997.

However, for power projects for which a guarantee has been issued since 1997 it is estimated that upon completion of these projects total annual carbon emissions will be of the order of 13.3 million tonnes. This is based on the following assumptions:

Fuel Type	ECGD Estimated capacity (MW)	CO_2 (tonnes per year) million	Carbon (tonnes per year) million
Coal	11,260	40.6	11.1
Oil	492	1.1	0.3
Gas	4,367	7.1	1.9
Total	16,139	48.8	13.3

It has been assumed the plants operate for 60 per cent. of the time (5,256 hours per year). CO_2 emissions are calculated using the following conversion factors—Coal: 0.687 tonnes of CO_2 per MW per hour, Oil 0.417, Gas: 0.309. These are taken from the Greenhouse Gas Protocol website, www.ghgprotocol.org, and are the 1999 average values for power plants in "Economies In Transition". These are the markets where ECGD most commonly provide guarantees.

Carbon emissions are calculated by assuming that carbon makes up 27.3 per cent. of the atomic mass of CO_2.

It should be noted that for most large power projects ECGD is only one of several finance providers. Scaling the carbon emissions by the proportion of finance guaranteed by ECGD would give a figure of less than 6 million tonnes per year of carbon, or less than 21 tonnes per year of CO_2, that is directly attributable to ECGD's participation.

Arms Exports

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the value was of ECGD support relating to arms exports to (a) Pakistan and (b) India since February 2000; and what payments have been made under the ECGD scheme. [65407]

Ms Hewitt: ECGD has not supported any defence exports to either Pakistan or India since February 2000.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the infringements of the no-fly zones around nuclear power stations that have been reported since inception, giving (a) the date, (b) the location and (c) an account of each incident; what action was taken to follow up each incident; and if she will make a statement. [64960]

Mr. Jamieson: I have been asked to reply.

There have been no confirmed infringements of flying restrictions around civil nuclear power stations since 1991. Information on earlier incidents is not readily available.

Construction Industry

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action she is taking to eliminate bogus self-employment claims in the construction industry. [63052]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply to my hon. Friend.

The Inland Revenue aims to ensure that the law on employment status is applied even-handedly across all sectors of industry, and that includes the construction industry sector. As part of its ongoing compliance strategy, the Inland Revenue's local employer compliance review teams consider employment status issues to ensure employers and contractors are compliant with the tax and National Insurance laws generally.

Motor Vehicles (LPG Conversions)

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many grants in respect of LPG conversions of motor vehicles have been given in each of the last five years. [65254]

Mr. Jamieson: I have been asked to reply.

The table gives the number of LPG vehicles benefiting from PowerShift grants in the last five years.

Financial year	Number of LPG vehicles receiving Powershift grants
1997–98	195
1998–99	637
1999–2000	1,674
2000–01	4,246
2001–02	3,967

LPG Fuel

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many vehicles subject to vehicle excise duty are capable of using LPG fuel. [65249]

Mr. Jamieson: I have been asked to reply.

DVLA statistics do not distinguish between liquefied petroleum gas (LPG) and, say, natural gas vehicles; only between vehicles that are dedicated gas or petrol/gas combinations. Generally, however, cars and light commercial vehicles tend to use LPG, while heavier vehicles use natural gas. The table shows the last five years for which figures are available:

	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001	2002
Private and Light Goods	6,715	10,121	14,421	21,098	23,916	24,308
Buses	31	53	97	121	139	153
Goods vehicles	75	93	141	171	237	236
Special vehicles	1,327	1,281	1,310	1,394	1,408	1,417
Exempt vehicles	698	733	774	903	1,103	1,115
Other vehicles	241	253	267	281	303	331
Total	9,087	12,534	17,010	23,968	27,106	27,560

These figures actually understate the number of vehicles because not all conversions to alternative fuelling are notified to DVLA and motorists are converting to LPG at an increasing rate. The total is expected to increase by about 25,000 per year over the next two years, prompted by the Government grants available, and the fact that low-cost LPG fuel is now available in all areas of the country.

All vehicles used on public roads in the UK have to be licensed annually. Generally such licensing includes payment of a duty of excise (Vehicle Excise Duty) on the licence but a number of vehicles are exempt from payment of duty. All of the vehicles included in the table as PLG, buses, goods, and special vehicles are subject to payment of VED. The category "other vehicles" includes motorcycles and other miscellaneous vehicles.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Blind and Partially-sighted People

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to consult organisations representing blind and partially-sighted people including the Royal National Institute for the Blind in developing the next UK Employment National Action Plan. [40417]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The current UK Employment Action Plan—for 2002-has been completed and deposited in the Library. It highlights the Government's employment strategy that seeks to ensure that the most help is given to those who face the greatest difficulty finding work, of which disabled people are a key group. The Department liaises with organisations like the Royal National Institute for the Blind (RNIB) on these policies, which are already in place or are being developed, at various stages.

In addition to that consultation, the UK Disability Forum for Europe, to which the RNIB belongs, contributed to the 2002 plan. This contact will be continued when the next plan, for 2003, is being prepared. Officials will be discussing with RNIB how best that organisation might continue to the preparation of the 2003 plan.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what measures he intends to include in the next UK Employment National Action Plan to improve job opportunities and job retention for blind and partially-sighted people. [40418]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The current UK Employment Action Plan—for 2002—has been completed and deposited in the Library. It highlights the Government's employment strategy that seeks to ensure that the most help is given to those who face the greatest difficulty finding work. In this context, the plan covers policies such as the New Deal for Disabled People, which extend to blind and partially-sighted people, as well as other people with disabilities.

The exact content of the 2003 plan can only be decided when the European Employment Guidelines—to be proposed this November—have been agreed. However, integrating into the labour market all those with a disadvantage will remain a priority for the UK and for Europe. Therefore, measures in this area are likely to be reported on in the next and future Employment Action Plans.

Foster Carers

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to extend home responsibilities protection to all foster carers to cover the period over which they have fostered children. [54810]

Mr. McCartney: Foster carers whose allowance contains a reward element may be liable for national insurance contributions on a self-employed basis. Where there is no liability, they may choose to pay voluntary contributions to assist in qualifying for state retirement pension. Foster carers who receive child benefit for their own children aged under 16 will be eligible for home responsibilities protection. We will keep these arrangements under review as we do with all rules relating to benefits.

Regional Organisations

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions which of the agencies and NDPBs sponsored by his Department have a regional organisation; and if he will list the counties and unitary authorities in each region in (a) 1997 and (b) 2002. [58953]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 19 June 2002, Official Report, column 406W.

Ministerial Visits (Wales)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the (a) date, (b) location and (c) purpose was of visits by Ministers in his Department to Wales since 1997; and when he next intends to visit Wales. [62078]

Mr. McCartney [holding answer 17 June 2002]: Since 1999 this Government have published an annual list of all visits undertaken by Cabinet Ministers costing £500 or more during each financial year. This Government have also published, on an annual basis, the cost of all Ministers' visits overseas. Information in respect of UK travel is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

However my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State (Alistair Darling) visited Swansea and Bridgend on the 12 February 2002, where he visited one of our new Pension Centres and a Jobcentreplus Office. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State (Andrew Smith) has no immediate plans to visit Wales, however my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State (Malcolm Wicks) is planning to visit Wales in the next month.

Benefits and Pensions

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what has been the cost of (a) unemployment benefit and (b) pensions as a percentage of the total services budget, in each year since 1997. [63171]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Information is not held in the precise form requested. The Department accounts for its administrative and programme expenditure in accordance with its key objectives, which are published in the Department's Public Service Agreement (PSA), and the individual Requests for Resources (RfRs), which are published in the Main Estimate. Details of the total consumption of resources from 1998–99 onwards by areas now included within the Department for Work and Pensions, and of the amounts specific to people of working age and pensioners, are published in Table 1 of the DWP Departmental Report 2002–03 to 2003–04 (Cm 5424) which is available in the Library. Directly comparable figures for 1997–98 are not available.

Early Retirement

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on the impact of early retirement on pension provision. [65017]

Mr. McCartney [holding answer 27 June 2002]: If people choose to retire early, they must save more over the years that they are working to achieve the same retirement income.

The Government believe that people should be able to make an informed choice when they plan their retirement, so that they have accumulated sufficient pension savings to provide the income they wish to receive. Our pension forecasting programme will help to achieve this by showing savers how much they can expect on retirement at state pension age.

The Government are also committed to active ageing. We are tackling age discrimination in employment, not least so that older people have increased opportunities to retain or find work, and are not forced into early retirement. Our Age Positive campaign promotes to employers the business benefits of an age-diverse work force, including the recruitment and retention of older workers. We are encouraging employers to adopt more flexible approaches to retirement for the benefits it can offer businesses and the increased choice and opportunities it offers individuals for a later more active retirement. The report 'Flexible Retirement—a snapshot of large employers' initiatives', published on 17 June, showed that some larger companies are indeed adopting more flexible retirement policies. There are also signs nationally that approaches to early retirement have been changing, as each year for the last four years the employment rate of people aged 50 to state pension age has increased faster than the overall employment rate.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Third Parties—Rights Against Insurers

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Government accept the recommendations made by the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission in their report on Third Parties—Rights Against Insurers. [66800]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Government have carefully considered this report, and accept the Law Commissions' recommendations. A consultation paper will be issued shortly on implementing the proposals by way of a Regulatory Reform Order.

Land Registration Act

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Lord Chancellor will implement the Land Registration Act 2002. [66799]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Land Registration Act 2002 will be brought into force on Monday 13 October 2003. This will allow sufficient time to consult on and make the necessary secondary legislation; to develop new office procedures to accommodate the new legislation and to carry out a thorough programme of education and training both within the Land Registry and across the wider conveyancing community.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Li Ruihuan

Dr. Gibson: To ask the President of the Council what representations concerning the situation in Tibet he made to Li Ruihuan, Chairman of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, during Chairman Li's recent visit to the UK; and what response he received. [63863]

Mr. Robin Cook: My noble friend the Lord Chancellor met Mr. Li and raised Tibet and other human rights concerns with him.

I hosted a large reception and banquet for Mr. Li, attended mainly by representatives of Scottish universities and businesses to celebrate their links with their counterparts in China. This occasion did not lend itself to exploring detailed issues of our diplomatic relations. I have raised Tibet many times with representatives of the Chinese Government and it figures prominently in the bilateral dialogue between our two Governments on human rights. In May the UK side visited a Tibetan community in Gansu Province, expressed concern at repression of monastic communities and raised the cases of 52 prisoners including Tibetans.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Beith: To ask the President of the Council what recent assessment he has made of the performance of Government Departments in providing timely answers to written parliamentary questions; and if he will make a statement. [65561]

Mr. Robin Cook: No recent assessment has been made.

However, I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) on 2 May 2002, Official Report, column 949W.

TREASURY

Monarch (Taxation)

Norman Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the 1993 Memorandum of Understanding, if he will list the categories of taxation where (a) the treatment of the monarch is indistinguishable from that of other citizens, (b) the monarch is exempt and (c) the monarch is exempt but chooses to make voluntary contributions. [65154]

Mr. Gordon Brown: The position is fully set out in the memorandum, a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Civil List

Norman Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the implications for Civil List annuity payments of the death of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother. [65158]

Mr. Gordon Brown: The parliamentary annuity paid to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother ceased upon her death.

Norman Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether requirement procedures for notification of the death of recipients of Civil List annuity payments upon the death of those recipients are the same as those for recipients of state pension payments. [65163]

Mr. Gordon Brown: Parliamentary annuities are paid under the Civil List Acts, and the legislation lays down no specific requirement for the notification of death of an annuitant.

Payments of annuities cease upon the death of the annuitant.

Norman Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the present level is of the Civil List Reserve. [65162]

Mr. Gordon Brown: As at 31 December 2001 the Civil List Reserve stands at £37,079,000.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) private sector and (b) public sector enterprises are eligible to pay the climate change levy in the Portsmouth, South constituency; and if he will make a statement. [65372]

John Healey: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Oral Questions

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many oral questions he has transferred to other Departments in each of the last 18 months. [65513]

John Healey: Since January 2001, 16 of the 480 oral questions tabled to Treasury Ministers have been transferred, in each case because they were more appropriate to other Departments. The breakdown sought by the hon. Gentleman is as follows:

Date of oral questions	Number transferred
25 January 2001	—
1 March 2001	—
29 March 2001	1
10 May 2001	—
19 July 2001	1
8 November 2001	5
6 December 2001	2
24 January 2002	2
28 February 2002	1
11 April 2002	1
9 May 2002	—
20 June 2002	3

Company Car Tax

John Mann: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his plans for company car tax. [65536]

John Healey: The new company car tax system linking the charge on the benefit of a company car to the level of its CO_2 emissions came into effect April this year.

The Inland Revenue will be undertaking an extensive evaluation exercise to capture the effects of the reforms.

Any changes to the system will be made in the context of the Chancellor's Budget decisions in future years.

Red Diesel

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many random inspections for red diesel were conducted during each of the last five years. [65246]

John Healey: To detect misuse of red diesel Customs are increasingly moving to risk-assessed inspections made at premises. Roadside checks of vehicles tend to be less targeted and in some cases have a random element.

I therefore refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) on 20 June 2002, Official Report, column 516W, concerning the number of roadside tests conducted.

Tax Law Rewrite Project

Barbara Follett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the work of the Tax Law Rewrite project. [66803]

Dawn Primarolo: I am pleased to tell the House that the Tax Law Rewrite project will soon reach another major milestone. The Inland Revenue will shortly publish the project's second draft Bill, on employment income, pensions and taxable social security benefits, for a final round of consultation. The Bill will be ready for introduction in Parliament by the end of the year.

Earlier versions of this rewritten legislation have been extensively revised in the light of comments and suggestions from tax professionals and other interested parties. This continuous dialogue between the project team and business interests, tax practitioners, the legal profession and Inland Revenue specialists is a key feature contributing to the success of the project.

Community Development Venture Fund

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 7 May 2002, Official Report, column 33W, on the Community Development Venture Fund, if he will place in the Library the performance indicators and targets that will be used for Bridges Community Ventures to measure performance. [61815]

Nigel Griffiths: I have been asked to reply.

The Fund Manager's performance will be primarily measured against:

(i) Commitment of the Fund within the seven year investment period, with at least 70 per cent. fully invested and the remainder committed to related follow on investment deals.

(ii) At least a 10 per cent. IRR across a portfolio of between 50 to 60 investment deals.

(iii) Investment deals being made in businesses located in the 25 per cent. most deprived qualifying wards in England, the business plans of which aim to:

(a) Create/safeguard that at least 35 per cent. of the employees of such businesses are from qualifying wards, or,

(b) Stimulate other businesses (e.g. supply chain) with at least 50 per cent. of non-salary expenditure going to local businesses in qualifying wards, or,

(c) Serve local people and businesses in qualifying wards—i.e. core target for services and products.

The Government, along with the other investors in this pilot Fund, expects the Fund to achieve social, as well as investment, returns. An independent specialist will be engaged to evaluate social impact and assess the Fund's performance in helping achieve:-

Wealth creation in deprived areas;-

Creation of good jobs in fast growing businesses

Developing entrepreneurial role models and,

Encouraging others in the venture capital supply market to spread their investments into the more deprived areas.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 7 May 2002, Official Report, column 33W, on the Community Development Venture Capital Fund, if he will place in the Library (a) the criteria used for the tendering process and (b) a list of the companies who applied to administer the fund. [61675]

Nigel Griffiths: I have been asked to reply.

The Community Development Venture Fund (CDVF) is not a Government administered or contracted out Fund, so (a) and (b) do not apply. I also refer the hon. Member to parliamentary question No. 61674 answered today.

It is a private sector initiative led by Sir Ronald Cohen, in his pro bono role as chairman of the Social Investment Task Force. In order to ensure that public investment in the Fund represents good value for money in promoting the Government's objective of boosting entrepreneurial business in disadvantaged communities, agreement was negotiated based on its experience with the Regional Venture Capital Funds.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 7 May 2002, Official Report, column 33W, on the Community Development Venture Capital Fund, if he will list (a) public and (b) private investors in Bridges Community Ventures. [61672]

Nigel Griffiths: I have been asked to reply.

The public investor is the Government through the Phoenix Fund of the Small Business Service.

The institutional and major individual private sector investors are listed on the Fund Manager's website at: www.bridgesventures.com and are:

Doughty Hanson & Co; HSBC; Lehman Brothers; Lloyds TSB (Scotland); Merrill Lynch;

Reuters; Royal Bank of Scotland; Schroder Salomon Smith Barney (partners in Citigroup);

West Midlands Pension Fund; Sir Ronald Cohen and Tom Singh.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 7 May 2002, Official Report, column 33W, on the Community Development Venture Fund, which Government Department will provide the funding announced in the last Budget for Bridges Community Ventures Ltd. [61673]

Nigel Griffiths: I have been asked to reply.

The funding for the Government's investment in the Community Development Venture Fund is being provided by the Small Business Service (Department of Trade and Industry), through its Phoenix Fund.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 7 May 2002, Official Report, column 33W, on the Community Development Venture Fund, if he will place in the Library the invitation to tender for the Community Development Venture Fund; and if he will make a statement on how the information was made available. [61674]

Nigel Griffiths: I have been asked to reply.

The Community Development Venture Fund (CDVF) is not a Government fund but a private sector led venture capital initiative, in which the Government are an investor alongside other private sector investors. As such, the issue of invitation to tender does not arise in this case.

As is common practice in the UK venture capital industry, the fund manager (Bridges Community Ventures Ltd) held discussions with a number of potential investors in the industry.

Income Tax

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) of 10 May 2002, Official Report, column 396W, on income tax, (a) how many and (b) what proportion of pensioners paid income tax in each year since 1992 broken down into figures for each tax bracket. [62579]

Dawn Primarolo: Estimates of the number and proportion of pensioner taxpayers by tax bracket are shown in the table.

	Number of pensioners paying tax at lower[1] rate (000s)	Percentage of all pensioners[2]	Number of pensioners paying tax at starting[3] rate (000s)	Percentage of all pensioners[2]	Number of pensioners paying tax at 'savers' rate[4] (000s)	Percentage of all pensioners[2]	Number of pensioners paying tax at basic rate[5] (000s)	Percentage of all pensioners[2]	Number of pensioners paying tax at higher rate[6] (000s)	Percentage of all pensioners[2]
1992–93	1,160	11	—	—	—	—	2,190	21	130	1
1993–94	1,520	14	—	—	—	—	1,920	18	130	1
1994–95	1,390	13	—	—	—	—	2,310	22	160	2

2001–02[7]	—	—	920	9	580	5	2,750	25	230	2

[1] From 1993–94 until 1998–99 a number of taxpayers with taxable income in excess of the lower rate limit only paid tax at the lower rate. This was because it was only their dividend income and (from 1996–97) their savings income which took their taxable income above the lower rate limit, and such income was chargeable to tax at the lower rate and not the basic rate.

[2] Source: Government Actuary's Department.

[3] In 1999–2000 the starting rate replaced the lower rate. Taxpayers with a marginal rate at the 10 per cent. starting rate from an extra £1 of earnings.

[4] Taxpayers with a marginal rate at the 20 per cent. lower rate for savings income or the 10 per cent. ordinary dividend rate from an extra £1 of earnings. Before 1999–2000 these people would have been classified as lower rate taxpayers.

[5] Taxpayers with a marginal rate at the basic rate from an extra £1 of earnings.

[6] Taxpayers with taxable income above the higher rate threshold.

[7] Provisional.

Pensioners are defined as women aged 60 and over and men aged 65 and over. This information is based on the Survey of Personal Incomes.

Tax Evasion

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amounts are involved in the prosecutions for tax evasion in the financial year 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [64249]

Dawn Primarolo: The amount involved in the prosecution cases for tax evasion in the financial year 2001–02 is £12,791,736.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many prosecutions there have been for tax evasion in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [64250]

Dawn Primarolo: In the years since 1997, the numbers of prosecutions have been as follows.

	Total	Including internal cases of:
1997–98	83	13
1998–99	57	8
1999–2000	55	2
2000–01	68	24
Plus tax credit cases	2	—
Total	70

The internal cases detailed include those cases of Inland Revenue employees who were prosecuted. They also include external accomplices.

The 2000–01 figure of 70 prosecutions includes two cases of tax credit fraud.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much funding has been given to investigating tax evasion in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [64251]

Dawn Primarolo: The amounts of funding given to investigating tax evasion are not recorded in this way by the Inland Revenue.

The annual report of the Inland Revenue records figures for the resources allocated to each of its departmental objectives. A copy of this report is in the House of Commons Library.

One such objective is > "bringing into the Exchequer the taxes, national insurance contributions and other receipts, maintaining contributory records and disbursing tax reliefs and credits, for which the Revenue are responsible".

The resources attributed to the meeting of this objective include those which will be used in the investigation of tax evasion, together with other activities aimed at tackling non-compliance more generally. For example, there are some sections of offices and even some individuals, involved in a spread of compliance activities and it is not practical to isolate the funding figures in the way this question has been asked.

Public Service Monitoring

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 21 June 2002, Official Report, column 586W, on public service monitoring, if he will place the value for money scores for each financial year since 1999–2000 for each Government Department in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [65181]

Mr. Boateng: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 21 June 2002, Official Report, column 586W.

Land Decontamination

Ms Shipley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what level of tax relief has been provided for land decontamination in each (a) nation and (b) region of the UK. [65067]

John Healey: Where qualifying conditions are met, waste arising from the reclamation of contaminated land is exempted from landfill tax wherever in the United Kingdom it is landfilled.

Companies can also claim a 150 per cent. payable tax credit for the costs incurred in cleaning up contaminated land sites. No estimates of the take-up of this measure are yet available.

Inheritance Tax

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans the Government have to extend inheritance tax provisions to all people in the UK. [65596]

Dawn Primarolo: Inheritance tax is payable on the world-wide estate of those who die domiciled in the UK, or are treated as domiciled here by virtue of their length of residence.

New Businesses

Vernon Coaker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the requirement for new businesses, including the self-employed, to register with the Inland Revenue within three months of setting up; what steps he has taken to inform businesses of this new requirement; and if he will make a statement. [65704]

Dawn Primarolo: Newly self-employed people who are liable to pay Class 2 National Insurance contributions are required by law to register with Inland Revenue "immediately" but this term was not further defined. Following public consultation, we have established a set time-limit for registration. At its introduction in January 2001 the modified requirement was advertised through the national, regional and ethnic press and on local radio stations. The requirement is clearly stated in all the Inland Revenue leaflets and guidance on starting up in business. Inland Revenue is evaluating the effectiveness of the new requirement and a report will be issued later this year. In 2001, the first year that the new requirement was in force, the number of self-employed people registering with Inland Revenue increased by 19 per cent. over the number registering in the year 2000.

Treasury Building (Refurbishment)

Michael Fabricant: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans his Department has to restore the parts of the facade of the Treasury main building not recently cleaned. [65560]

Ruth Kelly: Under the terms of the Treasury's PFI deal with Exchequer Partnership plc, it is their responsibility to clean the façade. The remaining parts will be cleaned in the next phase of the project.

National Insurance (Reduced Rate)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what basis the contribution rate of married women paying national insurance contributions at the reduced rate is set. [65292]

Ruth Kelly [holding answer 1 July 2002]: All National Insurance contribution rates, including those for married women who chose to pay reduced rate contributions, are set to provide for contributory benefit expenditure and for an allocation towards national health service funding.

Cancer

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the mortality rate was for skin cancer in the last year for which figures are available. [66682]

Ruth Kelly: the information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Bruce George, dated 2 July 2002:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your question concerning skin cancer mortality rates for the last year for which figures are available. (66682)

The latest available information is for deaths occurring in 2000. In that year, the death rate in England and Wales for malignant melanoma of the skin (International classification of Diseases Ninth Revision code 172) was 28 per million population for males and 21 per million population for females (directly age-standardised to the European Standard Population).[1]

HEALTH

Milk

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that all primary school children receive subsidised milk. [65033]

Mr. Miliband: I have been asked to reply.

There are no plans to ensure that all primary school children receive subsided milk. Milk provision policies are decided locally by local education authorities, or the governing bodies of former grant maintained schools and former grant maintained special schools.

Air Pollutants

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 15 May 2002, Official Report, column 678W, on air pollutants, what plans he has to make and assess measurements of concentrations of aldehydes in the air in localised environments; and if he will make a statement. [61527]

Mr. Meacher: I have been asked to reply.

An assessment of ambient formaldehyde concentrations was carried out by the former Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions in January to March 2000 to help inform the deliberations of the Department of Health's Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants. Formaldehyde was assessed as a marker for aldehydes. Monitoring sites were located at Teddington, London Marylebone Road, Southampton, Rochester, an industrial site near Hull and a coal burning site near Rotherham. Short-term concentrations (measured over 4 to 7 days) at all locations were low in comparison with concentrations that have been shown to produce irritation (see Table). Thresholds for sensory irritation in the majority of subjects are reported as 0.6–1.2 milligrams per cubic metre for formaldehyde and the World Health Organisation guideline is 0.1 milligrams per cubic metre. The highest concentrations were observed at the traffic dominated site at London Marylebone Road and the industrial site at Hull. No indoor measurements were taken. My Department does not have plans for further measurements of aldehydes.

Location and site type	Mean formaldehyde concentration (micrograms per cubic metre[1]) Minimum and maximum concentrations in parentheses
Teddington (suburban)	3.2 (0.25–9.1)
London Marylebone Road (kerbside)	13.4 (2–33.6)
Southampton (urban background)	2.3 (0.1–20.9)
Rochester (rural)	1.2 (0.2–4.0)
Hull (industrial)	4.4 (0.15–45.0)
Rotherham (coal burning area)	0.6 (0.1–2.5)

[1] One microgram per cubic metre is one thousandth of a milligram per cubic metre.

National Care Standards

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of the accuracy of the national care standards full regulatory impact assessment's annexe A paragraph 7 relating to the cost of upgrading a 24-bed unit; and if he will make a statement; [40887]

(2) for what reason the national care standards full regulatory impact assessment placed in the Library between 23 and 31 January did not contain figures in line with a commitment made by his officials to the Leonard Cheshire Foundation on 3 August 2001; if he will publish a corrected version; and how the regulatory impact assessment would need to be amended in the light of this correction. [41269]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 7 March 2002]: A factual inaccuracy in the regulatory impact assessment has been brought to my attention. I will be making a correction to the regulatory impact assessment so that it accurately represents information provided by the Leonard Cheshire organisation.

Vaccines

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Government plan to set up their own vaccine production organisation. [53894]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 2 May 2002]: There are no plans for the Government to set up their own vaccine production organisation.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration his Department gave to tests on the (a) Lister and (b) New York strains in smallpox vaccines; and what conclusion they drew, with particular reference to the superiority or otherwise in relation to other strains in vaccines. [54657]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 8 May 2002]: The choice of new vaccine was made on the basis of advice from the scientific community and from across Government. The advice of experts under the auspices of a specially convened sub-group of the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation was sought specifically in relation to strain type and vaccine efficacy. Their advice was that there was no significant difference between the two strains on scientific grounds. Vaccines based on both strains were considered to have been effective in the past, and both strains are expected to produce effective new vaccines for the future.

Though vaccines based upon both strains were used as part of the World Health Organisation's eradication campaign, there was a greater body of evidence to demonstrate the efficacy of the Lister strain vaccine than for the New York City board of health (NYCBH) strain. The Lister based smallpox vaccine, preferred by the UK Government, has been challenged in the field more often by the more severe form of smallpox (variola major) than the NYCBH strain.

A dual approach, using a different strain for UK vaccine to that preferred by the US Government, as in the past, is considered to offer the best scope for successful new vaccine production, and provides a fall back mechanism if difficulties arise with the production of either vaccine.

Maladministration

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many findings there have been of maladministration by ombudsmen with responsibility for agencies under the remit of his Department since 1997. [56309]

Mr. Lammy: Information on the handling of complaints is set out in tabular form by the parliamentary ombudsman each year as an attachment to his annual report. For those complaints where there was evidence of maladministration which warranted a full investigation, the table sets out how many complaints were upheld as being fully or partially justified. Copies of the parliamentary ombudsman's annual reports for the period 1997–98 to 2000–01 inclusive can be viewed in the Library, or on the parliamentary ombudsman's website at www.ombudsman.org.uk/publications.

In addition, the pensions ombudsman has made 21 findings of maladministration with respect to the National Health Service Pensions Agency since 1997.

Disclosure of Interests

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what rules apply to the disclosure of interests on the part of those serving on public bodies which are responsible to his Department. [56459]

Mr. Lammy: Government policy on disclosure of interests by members of public bodies was set out in "Quangos—opening the doors" (1998). This policy is reflected in model codes of practice issued by the Cabinet Office for adoption by these bodies. Bodies' codes require that board members should declare in a register for the purpose any personal or business interest which may, or may be perceived to, influence their judgment, and that the register should be kept up-to-date and open to the public. The codes also state that board members should not participate in the discussion or determination of matters in which they have an interest and should normally withdraw from the meeting if their interest is direct and pecuniary.

Staff Numbers

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff were employed in the Medicines Control Agency at 1 April; and what proportion of those staff have clinical contact with NHS patients. [56855]

Mr. Lammy: The MCA have employed 517 full-time equivalent staff as at 1 April 2002 of which 12 (2.3 per cent.) have clinical contact with national health service patients.

General Practitioners

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what he estimates will be the average cost to general practitioners of opting out of 24-hour responsibility. [65575]

Mr. Hutton: This will be addressed as part of the process for pricing the new general practitioners contract which is being negotiated by the National Health Service Confederation and British Medical Association.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if it is his policy to exempt from the recommendation that providers of out-of-hours services put in place appropriate systems for call abandonment, call recording and the recording of clinical consultations those general practitioners who wish to carry out their own out-of-hours cover. [55051]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 16 May 2002]: The Government are committed to modernising primary care out-of-hours services in line with the recommendations of the Carson report, "Raising Standards for Patients: New Partnerships in Out-of-hours Care". These improvements include quality standards which all service providers, individual general practitioners (GPs) as well as organised providers, will be required to meet. These standards do however include some easements for individual GPs on reporting requirements and telephony standards for call abandonment, which it would be inappropriate to apply to GPs who choose to provide out-of-hours services themselves until the calls are routed through NHS Direct.

EC Decisions

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the effects of Commission Decision 179 of 18 April 2000, 2002/154/EC, OJ L54 25 February 2002, on current practice; and what reasons underlie the delay in enactment. [57898]

Mr. Hutton: The Administrative Commission on Social Security for Migrant Workers oversees the application of regulations (EEC) 1408–71 and 574–72 on co-ordination of the social security and health care schemes of the member states. Administrative Commission Decision 179 concerned technical amendments to a number of European Union forms used for the application of various aspects of the regulations as a consequence of minor changes to the regulations themselves.

The position on each of the EU forms concerned is as follows:

E111 has been changed to afford extra health rights for students in some member states; there are no practical effects for UK students. UK E111 will be amended during the next reprint of the Department's leaflet, "Health Advice for Travellers", in late summer;

E111B is issued only by Belgium;

E113 and E114 are not issued by, nor required by, the UK;

E115–118 are concerned with claims for cash incapacity benefits and are being reprinted;

E125–127 are used between member states' health administrations on reimbursement of health care costs; UK-issued forms are produced electronically and the computer system is being updated.

National Institute for Clinical Excellence

Matthew Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that health care professionals are informed of the direction his Department has given to support the implementation of NICE guidance; and if he will make a statement. [59858]

Mr. Hutton: Chief executives of national health service bodies in England were told about the directions in a bulletin to them dated 14 December 2001. They were asked to cascade the information to all relevant staff.

The directions came into force on 1 January 2002, and place statutory obligations on NHS bodies to provide funding for clinical decisions within recommendations from National Institute for Clinical Excellence within three months of their appraisal guidance being issued. The text of the directions has been placed on three websites:

www.doh.gov.uk/pricare/pcts.htm

www.psu.ppa.nhs.uk

Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Audit Commission will retain a role in assessing the operational efficiency at the NHS when the Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection has been established. [59868]

Mr. Lammy: Responsibility for assessing operational efficiency of National Health Service bodies will transfer from the Audit Commission to the new health inspectorate once it has been established. The Audit Commission will retain its core financial function of appointing auditors and undertaking financial audit.

Capital Projects

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent speeches he has made on design quality within his Department's capital building programme. [59833]

Mr. Lammy: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State launched the Department's design programme in November 2001 at a joint conference with HRH the Prince of Wales. He recently appointed my noble Friend, the Lord Hunt of Kingsheath as the Ministerial Design Champion. My noble Friend addressed a number of conferences highlighting the Department's design programme 'Achieving Excellence in Healthcare Design', including:

'Design and Primary Care conference', on 1 May 2002 hosted by the Kings Fund and the commission for architecture and the built environment (CABE). My noble Friend announced the NHS Estates and CABE joint framework agreement to contribute to the programme of delivering design excellence and thereby producing high quality environments for patients and staff. 'Championing Design Excellence in Healthcare Buildings', breakfast meeting at the NHS Confederation on 23 May 2002. My noble Friend addressed some of the recently appointed NHS Trust Design Champions and key decision-makers. 'Health Estates Facilities Management Association (HEFMA) conference' on the afternoon of the 23 May 2002. My noble Friend addressed an audience of estates and facilities directors outlining the Departments design programme.

Future events are planned.

Correspondence

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when a substantive reply will be given to Mrs. D. F. Hay's letter of 26 January, concerning the state of the NHS. [59225]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 24 May 2002]: The Department has no record of receiving this correspondence. The Department's Ministerial Correspondence Unit is seeking a copy of this correspondence.

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will respond to the letter of the hon. Member for South-west Hertfordshire of 14 March, Ref 1005934. [66254]

Ms Blears: A reply was sent on 1 July.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will respond to the letter of the hon. Member for Hexham of 20 February on diabetes and isley research. [65649]

Jacqui Smith: A reply was sent on 8 April.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will respond to the letter of the hon. Member for Hexham of 30 April on NHS dental treatment. [65648]

Mr. Lammy: A reply was sent on 1 July.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will respond to the hon. Member for Hexham's letter of 18 March on food security in the UK, ref. MCHANH001761. [65650]

Ms Blears: A reply was sent on 24 June.

Age Discrimination

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if (a) his Department and (b) its agencies have a policy of not considering applications for employment by persons over a particular age. [59582]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 24 May 2002]: At present the Department and its executive agencies have a normal staff retirement age of 60 and do not consider applications for employment from those over that age. However, the Department is now involved in a centrally led initiative, winning the generation game, which will examine age-related issues such as flexible retirement beyond the normal retiring age of 60.

The Department is committed to ensuring that older people are never unfairly discriminated against and complies with the rules and requirements of the 'Minister's Rules for Selection', 'The Civil Service Order Council', Her Majesty's Treasury requirements for recruitment and equal opportunity and employment protection legislation.

Drug Side-effects

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the structures in place to ensure that adverse drug reactions in patients are picked up at the earliest possible stage in situations where there are concerns about potential side-effects of a drug. [60788]

Ms Blears: The Medicines Control Agency (MCA) is responsible for monitoring the safety of medicines on the UK market, and has well-developed procedures in place for pharmacovigilance, enabling early identification and prompt action in relation to drug safety issues.

The yellow card scheme, introduced in 1964 after the thalidomide tragedy, has a world-wide reputation for effectiveness in detecting previously unidentified drug safety hazards. All newly introduced medicines are monitored intensively for at least two years, during which time the safety profile of the medicine is frequently reviewed to ensure that it is appropriately reflected in the product information for health professionals and patients. In addition to spontaneous reports of suspected adverse reactions, the MCA evaluates data on drug safety from a range of sources. In 1999, MCA acquired the general practice research database and its post-licensing division is now evaluating its potential in contributing to effective pharmacovigilance.

The capability for early action on emerging safety issues is reflected in the MCA's high level and operational targets. These measure performance in terms of the time taken to make newly received spontaneous adverse reaction reports available for review and analysis by pharmacovigilance assessors. MCA's performance against targets is published annually and in 2001–02 all targets were met or exceeded, against a background of a 55 per cent. increase in spontaneous adverse reaction reports.

The committee on safety of medicines (CSM) has a statutory role in advising the licensing authority on promotion of the collection and investigation of adverse reactions. CSM regularly reviews the effectiveness of the yellow card scheme, and on advice of the CSM in 1999 the scheme was widened to include pharmacists. Following a successful pilot in relation to the meningitis C vaccination programme, the CSM has advised that the scheme should be extended to nurses.

Advertising Campaigns

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent on press and advertising campaigns in 2001–02; and what the planned expenditure is for 2002–03. [60913]

Mr. Lammy: In 2001–02 the Department spent £21.146 million on press and media advertising. The Department's current forecast for expenditure on press and media advertising in 2002–03 is £20.494 million.

Doctors (Recruitment)

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those countries from which his Department will not recruit doctors. [61418]

Mr. Hutton: National health service employers should not target developing countries for recruitment of health care personnel unless the Government of that country has reached Government to Government agreements with the UK. In these circumstances, individuals may be appointed to a structured programme aimed at enhancing clinical practice in order for them to return home after an agreed period.

The only other exception supported under the code of practice is the long-standing tradition of providing health care professionals with formal training and education.

Children in Care

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the funding was for each of the last five years for children in care in England (a) broken down by health authority and (b) expressed as an average per head. [61365]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 17 June 2002]: Data on the funding specifically of children in care are not available centrally. Data on the funding of caring services for children are also unavailable broken down by health authority. The table shows the budgets, per head of population aged 18 and over for England, allocated by each local authority for children and family.

[1] Not available as the council did not exist in that financial year.

Notes:

Budget figures are taken from form RA as recorded by the council's chief financial officer at the start of the financial year and divided by the population aged under 18 at 30 June.

The population figure used in 2001–02 is the population at 30 June 2000.

Budget figures shown in this table do not take account any subsequent revisions made during the financial year.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children in care have been found to be illegal substance users in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [64519]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is not held centrally. The Office of National Statistics is currently conducting a survey for the Department of the mental health of children looked after by local authorities in England. The survey questionnaire includes a range of questions about drug use. The Office of National Statistics plans to publish a report of the findings in spring 2003.

Mutual Organisations

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on what support his Department has made available to those wishing to set up mutual organisations in the field of health and social care. [62986]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 19 June 2002]: The Department is considering a range of options for the legal status of foundation trusts and a form of mutual organisation may be considered. A new organisational form—the public interest company—may be considered. To date, the Department has not offered specific support available for either option.

MS Patients

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of the establishment of the structures necessary to assess MS patients in respect of their suitability for the use of beta interferon; [63147]

(2) how many MS patients have commenced assessment for eligibility for beta interferon in the first four weeks since the scheme was launched on 6 May in each regional health authority; and if he will make a statement. [63145]

Mr. Lammy: It has been estimated that up to 9,000 multiple sclerosis patients in England and Wales may be eligible to receive treatment under the risk-sharing scheme, which started on 6 May 2002. Some centres have now started prescribing under the scheme, though the guidance in Health Service Circular 2002–004 recognises that appropriate national health service infrastructure may not yet be in place in some localities. The scheme co-ordinator will collect information on progress and activity under the scheme, but as yet such details are not available centrally.

Empty Properties

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what empty properties in the London borough of Wandsworth are owned by (a) his Department and (b) other public bodies for which he has responsibility. [63590]

Mr. Lammy: There are no empty properties owned by this Department within the London borough of Wandsworth.

There are five former residential cottages on the edge of the Springfield Hospital site currently empty which are part of the national health service estate (owned by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State). They are known locally as Burntwood Villas (two), and Myrtle Cottages (three) all of which are situated on Burntwood Lane.

These properties are currently in the process of being transferred to the local South-West London and St. George's Mental Health NHS Trust, who plan to turn Burntwood Villas into staff accommodation and to redevelop Myrtle Cottages into new general practitioner property.

These developments are part of the continuing expansion of health care activity on the Springfield Hospital site.

Enzyme Potential Desensitisatia

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the health authorities which provide enzyme potential desensitisatia on the national health service. [63531]

Mr. Lammy: Information is not held centrally on the types of treatment available to patients on the national health service by health authority.

Cane Hill

Richard Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 10 June 2002, Official Report, column 1088W, on Cane Hill, Coulsdon, which part of his Department is responsible for (a) the day to day management of Cane Hill and (b) making decisions as to its future. [63791]

Ms Blears: The day to day management of the non-operational areas of the Cane Hill site is carried out by NHS Estates. The operational areas are managed by South London and Maudsley National Health Service Trust.

Similarly, decisions on the future of the surplus areas of the site are made by NHS Estates following discussions with South London and Maudsley NHS Trust and any other relevant parties, and decisions for the future of the operational areas of the site are made by the trust.

Remploy

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the value is of Remploy products purchased by his Department in each year since 1995. [63824]

Mr. Lammy: Payments by the Department to Remploy for goods and services in the last five financial years are £76,005 (1997–98), £14,962 (1998–99), £33,819 (1999–2000), £19,473 (2000–01) and £1003 (2001–2).

Information prior to 1997–98 is not available. This answer does not include the national health service.

Crèche Provision (NHS Employees)

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the adequacy of crèche provision for NHS employees. [63821]

Mr. Hutton: A national survey of national health service provision, undertaken early in 2001, found that 114 NHS trusts provided nursery facilities for their staff. The Government recognise that there is a need to provide support for parents working in the NHS in order to be a good employer, to improve the working (and home) lives of staff, and to recruit, retain and return key staff. For this reason, we have made over £70 million available for the NHS child care strategy, to develop an additional 150 further on-site nursery schemes by 2004. 60 new nursery schemes were funded last year and a further 30 have had funding allocated already this year. In addition, we expect all new build hospitals to include an on-site nursery in its plans.

We are expanding the NHS child care strategy to cover other forms of child care and to ensure that all staff groups are included. We have pledged additional funding for the NHS child care, building up to £100 million, to do this.

Director of International Recruitment

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the proposed budget is for the Director of International Recruitment for Health Services in the next two years; [63874]

(2) who will be the next Director of International Recruitment for Health Services; [63875]

(3) if he will (a) set out the targets set out for the Director of International Recruitment and (b) list the performance against targets of the international recruitment for health for 2001–02. [63876]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 24 June 2002]: The Department currently has no plans to recruit a Director of International Recruitment.

Hospitals (Zero Stars)

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress of franchising the management of those hospitals with zero stars. [64326]

Mr. Hutton: Five zero-rated national health service trusts appointed new chief executives under franchise arrangements in May and June. The hospital trusts concerned are: Dartford and Gravesham National Health Service Trust, Ashford and St. Peters Hospital National Health Service Trust, Portsmouth Hospitals National Health Service Trust, Barnet and Chase Farm Hospitals National Health Service Trust, and University Hospitals of Coventry and Warwickshire National Health Service Trust.

A sixth trust, East and North Hertfordshire National Health Service Trust is in the process of being franchised. The remaining six hospital trusts which received a zero-star rating in September 2001 have been making progress under existing management arrangements and continue to be monitored closely.

Bed-blocking

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether, with regard to bed blocking, local authority social service departments will be penalised if a patient in hospital is awaiting a place in a home of their choice. [64458]
